The Israel Friends of Akim, he told them, "has to set the example for other Friends on the international level."

Akim's 40 million shekel budget comes from government departments of health, social welfare, education, and mental health. Still, money has to be found for furnishing, programming, transportation, and other services – some 30 percent of the budget.

"It is upsetting to me that world Jewry says that because Israel is growing financially, and progressing, that it can manage on its own. The country has a huge deficit, for facilities, absorption, universities, hospitals, and organizations – like Akim."

For instance, Akim is currently refurbishing the D. Lou Harris hostel in Tel Aviv, named for the Toronto businessman. While most of the money comes from the municipality, more is needed.

"We are also updating the one in Rehovot, that was built 15 or 20 years ago. It wasn't bad before, but it needed to be updated."

Public relations is important, Marks said. "We have to educate families so they will know what facilities are available, and the neighbors [where the hostels and other housing are located] so they will realize that they don't have to be worried."

In early 1999, he said, he plans to organize a gathering of international supporters of Akim in Israel. In June 1999 Akim has been asked to bring 16 athletes to the world handicapped games in North Carolina. "We want to bring those athletes, and make sure they get the services they need."

The Canadian Friends of Akim was founded by Olga Eisen and George Banias 30 years ago. It has the same need as its Israeli counterpart for an infusion of young volunteers.

For more information, contact Eisen at 222-7267 or 222-7220. Akim also has a Web site – [www.akim.org.il].

Poland honors Lenkinski

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The government of Poland recently awarded one of its highest honors to the widow of Jewish activist Louis Lenkinski, in memory of her late husband.

"He was a fighter for solidarity and the workers' movement in Poland," said Polish Consul General Wojciech Tycinski in presenting the Officer's Order of Merit of the Republic of Poland to Helen Lenkinski.

Her husband was the first president of the Polish-Jewish Heritage Foundation, which sponsored the third memorial Louis Lenkinski lecture by historian Paula Draper at the Workmen's Circle.

Most Holocaust survivors from Poland did not enter the mainstream of Canadian life, Draper said, drawing on her experiences as an interviewer for the Spielberg Shoah Foundation, which recorded the memories of Holocaust survivors.

Because they were met by hostility, "Canadians didn't want to hear stories about the war," Draper said, and the Polish survivors tended to remain together. As an example, she cited the case of 10 couples who were friends; six of the couples bought cottages on the same lake and five of them wintered in Florida at the same place.

Estimating that 40,000 Holocaust survivors ended up in Canada, Draper said many of them were anxious to get away from eastern Europe, "not realizing how well memories travel."

She spoke of survivors who, in some cases, were rescued by Poles, embraced Catholicism and were reluctant to return to their Jewish families when they were discovered.

Draper interviewed Jews who married non-Jewish Poles and subsequently came to Canada. They had both Jewish and non-Jewish friends, she said.

Catholicism was so important to one Jewish survivor Draper interviewed that the survivor prayed to a Catholic saint for her father's safe return.

"This survivor was afraid of being Jewish and she brought this confusion with her to Canada."

Many survivors hid their Jewish identities in order to live. Some have maintained their links with Polish rescuers.

"The Shoah immigrants who came to Canada were a unique people and Canada had never seen anything like them," she said.

Promoting good relations between Polish Canadians and Holocaust survivors is a "difficult" task, said foundation president Dr. John Stanley in closing the meeting.

"It's not an easy task," he said. "Some events shed more heat than light, but this bridge-building has to be done."

SPECIAL SCHOOL NEEDS SPECIAL SUPPORT

Toronto's only Jewish day school for children with wide-ranging special needs is proud of its policy of not turning any child away. But according to Zareinu school principals Carol Goldman and Marion Goldmintz, scarce funding and overburdened resources are making the open door policy harder to maintain.

That's why UJA Federation has provided Zareinu with more than $100,000 in financial assistance over the past two years.

The Zareinu Educational Centre, established in 1986 with no funding from the federal or provincial government, provides special education, physiotherapy, music, occupational and communication therapies to children with autism, Down Syndrome, Cerebral Palsy and other disorders.

Zareinu's enrollment of 47 has doubled over the last two years and a waiting list grows daily. The average annual cost for each student is $22,000, but to make the school more accessible, full tuition is set at $13,500. In spite of the tuition subsidy, according to Goldmintz, fewer than 5% of parents are able to pay the full fee.

Overcrowding has also forced the school to find a new location to house nearly 100 students. "Right now, we have therapists holding sessions with students in stairwells, and computer labs in closets," says Goldman. "There's not one inch of space that isn't being used."

"That's why we have to be creative when it comes to funding," explains Goldmintz. "Otherwise we couldn't keep the school open and these very special kids would fall through the cracks."

The majority of Zareinu's funding is obtained by members of the Board of Directors and the school's Zareinu dollars program, through which community members donate to the school by purchasing groceries with Zareinu currency certificates. Zareinu dollars, which are accepted by close to 100 merchants and service providers in the community, can be purchased by calling (416) 787-8278.

"Every day that a child remains on the waiting list we lose precious time and opportunity for them to get out of a wheelchair or speak their first words," says Goldman. "We can't afford to keep them waiting any longer."

SPONSORS BACK ISRAEL AT 50

For nearly a year Toronto's Jewish community has been celebrating Israel's 50th anniversary with the passion of a people bound together by a 2000 year struggle for existence. And while countless volunteers and community leaders have been the stewards of a successful stream of events, none of this would be possible without unprecedented support from corporate and individual sponsors.

To date, more than $1.4 million dollars have been raised outside the UJA Federation Campaign to help finance community wide festivities marking Israel's 50th - among them - the April 30th Night Of A Lifetime Gala which drew a crowd of over 10,000, and the UJA Federation Israel 50 Fun Walk and the Israel at 50 Festival, which attracted a record 15,000.

"The challenge was to obtain financial support for Israel at 50 celebrations without affecting support for ongoing community agencies," explains Gerald Sheff, who spearheaded the sponsorship effort. "We approached those who have demonstrated a strong, abiding, long-term commitment to supporting the State of Israel and they in return felt privileged to play an integral role in this historic occasion," he adds. "Patrons enthusiastically offered their financial support over and above their usual donations."

Among the more than 50 corporate sponsors who committed a minimum of $25,000 throughout the jubilee year are Canadian Highways International Corporation, First Marathon Securities, Air Canada, Gee Jeffrey and Partners, Hong Kong Bank of Canada, MacDonalds Restaurants of Canada Limited, Newcourt Credit, Oshawa Group, Royal Bank, Yorkdale Shopping Centre, Mediacom, The Toronto Sun, Second Cup and El Al Israeli Airlines, which is the official airline of the Israel at Fifty Pavilion at the CNE this summer.

Corporate and individual sponsors helped make the UJA Federation Israel 50 Fun Walk and Israel at 50 Festival huge successes.

IT'S AN ISRAEL EXPERIENCE

Whether you're into admiring archeological treasures, challenging yourself to a rock climbing adventure or enjoying exotic culinary delights, the Israel at Fifty Pavilion has it all for you under one roof.

From August 21 – September 7, the CNE's National Trade Centre will house a colourful collection of Israeli goods and products, art, entertainment, food, fashion and technology profiling every segment of Israeli society to mark Israel's 50th anniversary. Special attractions include an interactive Negev desert landscape with camel rides, an historic photographic exhibit and a 5th century mosaic synagogue floor from Tzippori depicting the sacrifice of Isaac.

There will also be live entertainment for adults and kids including Israeli pop music group Yovel and Canadian children's' favorite Judy and David.

"We're offering something for everyone," says Israel at Fifty Pavilion Chair Karen Morton. CNE officials expect more than 2 million park visitors to make their way into the Pavilion, which is being sponsored by the Israel at 50 Consortium under the auspices of UJA Federation and the Consul General of Israel.

CLOTHES COMFORT

Participants on UJA Federation's upcoming Yachdav International Young Leadership Mission to Kiev and Israel, will be making a special delivery to Kiev's Jewish community next week. The group will be distributing 50 duffel bags full of new clothing items donated by local manufacturers, retailers and importers to needy Jews living in the Ukraine capital. The clothes collection effort was conducted by UJA Federation's Fashion Division Campaign spearheaded by Co-chairs Ron Prosserman and Laurie Cohen as well as Lynn Morris and Colin Lewis. Pictured with volunteer duffel stuffers are Ron Prosserman (back centre) and Laurie Cohen (middle left).

Camp Shalom marks its 50th

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — In honor of its 50th anniversary, Camp Shalom is dedicating a new gate to the camp's founders at a ceremony to be held June 14 at the campsite on Lake Muskoka near Gravenhurst.

Part of the family of Young Judaea camps, Camp Shalom was founded by Harris Gulko and purchased by the Toronto Zionist Council in 1948, which coincided with the establishment of the State of Israel.

In its first summer, 25 campers and several volunteer counsellors, under the direction of Gulko, stayed at the camp's 17-acre site, which the council had bought from Silver Birch Lodge for about $20,000. In 1954, 37 acres of land were purchased adjacent to the original site.

Today, there are 235 campers and 95 staff in each of July and August. Facilities include two large sports fields, tennis and basketball courts and a 100-foot waterfront.

Yossi Winter, president of the Toronto Zionist Council, said that to celebrate the camp's anniversary, the council has expanded the kosher kitchen by 30 percent and has added a bakery that will be in operation all night, "so campers and staff can enjoy freshly baked bread and pastries."

As well, the camp's water supply has been hooked up to Gravenhurst so that the tap water will be drinkable, he said.

A commemorative 50th anniversary watch has been designed in styles for children and adults.

The "traditional Zionist camp was created with the intent of instilling the campers with a love of Israel," said Malka Klein, the camp administrator.

Each year, she said, the camp's activities revolve around a specific theme. "Last year, the theme was the 100th anniversary of the first Zionist conference, and this year, of course, it will be Israel's 50th anniversary. Some special activities such as arts and crafts will relate to that theme, and the cook will create some Israeli dishes."

Judaic values are presented to the campers "in an informal, fun way," Klein said. "We are not an academic camp. Kids need a break from studying. We present a Hebrew word of the day, and all our buildings and many activities are given Hebrew names. Campers do not even know they are learning. We hold Shabbat services and a havdalah service. On a particularly hot day, we may hold the service at the lake."

For the fifth year, the camp is sponsoring 10 Israeli children who have reached bar or bat mitzvah age. The youth, chosen by the Israeli Victims of War committee are flown in by the committee.

"We are one of many camps across North America who do this. It gives campers here a chance to get to know Israeli youth, and it gives the Israelis a chance to enjoy camp. It works well all around," Klein said.

She acknowledges that the camp could expand, "but we would lose our special, intimate atmosphere. By the end of camp, most kids know each other and the staff know most of the campers."

Klein says that at the day-long celebration, she expects several past and present campers and staff, as well as members of the community "who want to see what the camp is all about. Catering will be provided by Abe Levy Caterers, and entertainment by the Mickey Lewin Band. Bob Betts, mayor of Gravenhurst, will be at the dedication ceremony.

Eating disorders examined

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Although some aspects of Jewish culture may predispose young women to eating disorders, Judaism can also play a healing role for those who already suffer them.

"I want to emphasize that," said Esther Kane in a recent interview at the kitchen table of her mother's Toronto home.

Kane, 27, is completing her master of social work degree at the University of British Columbia (UBC). Her thesis, which she is to defend this month, is entitled Not Just A Pretty Face: Exploring Jewish Women's Experiences of Eating Problems.

There are very few papers on eating disorders within the Jewish community. Kane's is likely the first to be completed in Canada.

An eating disorder survivor herself, Kane, who earned a bachelor of social work from Ryerson Polytechnic University in 1996, profiled three Jewish women who have struggled with food issues and body image.

Their struggles are "intimately linked to their experiences of being Jewish," Kane wrote. "Implications for practice suggest the need for a culturally-sensitive approach."

Kane regained her equilibrium five years ago after a decade-long battle with debilitating bulimia. She credits her recovery to determination, therapy and a lot of support.

Her research on Jewish women, as well as a placement as a therapist intern at Jewish Family Services in Vancouver, proved to be both painful and healing.

Her next project is to compile stories of women with eating disorders, for eventual publication. (She can be contacted by e-mail until the end of the summer at [ekane@unixg.ubc.ca].)

The granddaughter of socialists, Kane was born to Jewish parents who "believed in diversity and everyone being the same... I hardly ever knew any Jewish kids. I didn't have the typical Jewish experience... but ethnicity and culture are such a big part of who you are, it's got to have an impact."

Esther Kane

Food was always an issue in her family, she recalls. It seemed, wrote Kane in her thesis, that her elders were consumed with what they ate or forbade themselves to eat, and were vigilant about maintaining a certain body size.

Kane's mother Marion, who is food editor of the Toronto Star, no longer refers to "our Russian peasant bodies," noted Esther. Her mother has become "a role model of a strong Jewish woman who loves herself."

"It goes with self-esteem," explained Marion in a separate interview.

Esther, after years of thinking she was too dark, too short and too round, now revels in visiting art galleries to see the depictions of full-figured women who once set a standard for beauty.

For the interview, she wore her own artwork – earrings and a necklace depicting a full-figured woman balancing the sun in upraised arms, her feet planted firmly on the Earth.

"I look at Jewish women now, and think we're so beautiful," said Esther. Glamorous role models like Bette Midler and Barbra Streisand have helped, she noted.

Hearing the stories of other Jewish women who had eating disorders, she felt for the first time "a sense of belonging to a people... outside of my own family."

All the women she interviewed contextualize their eating problems within a Jewish context, Kane said. "Their first memories of binging or thinking they were fat were... at a Passover dinner or in their bubbie's kitchen. I found myself having to translate Yiddish words a lot. They all felt there was a strong connection [between being Jewish and having an eating disorder]."

Although Marion Kane thinks food is sometimes too important in Jewish families, food and mealtimes have positive associations for her, dating back to her childhood.

Among the themes that emerged in Esther's research was one called "family hold back," in which special food would be prepared for guests. A woman Kane called Rachael – who relied on spiritual aspects of Judaism to help her recover – said, "Of course when the guests leave... it's saved for something else. Other people coming into our home had better treatment than we did."

Other interlinked themes were a focus on intellectual achievement, an undue focus on looks, and a lack of acknowledgment of sexuality.

Although Kane believes a Jewish woman therapist might have an advantage in treating Jewish women ("there's a certain understanding"), she cautions that just because one is Jewish doesn't mean she will have anything in common with her Jewish clients.

Over the past few years, Kane has re-connected to the Jewish community, most recently through her involvement with Vancouver Hillel. An undergraduate course in Jewish history at UBC helped put into context things she had understood only vaguely, she said.

In her own family, one grandparent had escaped the Holocaust, another had escaped pogroms. Kane's eating disorder reflected, in part, anti-Semitism she had internalized, she explained.

For Kane, her thesis and this article mark the first time she is going public about having had an eating disorder. "To break out of the silence and to be heard without judgment is the most healing thing."

Former Nazi collaborator found in B.C.

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The government of France is searching its postwar records in the wake of a news report that a former Nazi collaborator sentenced to death after the war is alive and well in British Columbia.

Louis de Corail, press secretary of the French Embassy in Ottawa, said a Globe and Mail story that Louis Robin is a fugitive from French justice caught the embassy by surprise. The embassy was not aware that Robin, whose real name is Rene Louis Gabriel Azais, was living in Canada. He said the embassy had passed the information about Robin to Paris, but it was too early to determine whether France would request Robin's extradition, should the report about him prove true.

Last week, Estanislao Oziewicz of the Globe and Mail reported that Robin had been sentenced to death by a postwar French court for collaborating with the Nazis. He was on death row in prison when he cut through jail bars with a hacksaw and escaped. He found work on board a ship but developed medical problems while on a stop in Vancouver. Robin decided to remain, but he never obtained Canadian citizenship.

According to the report, Robin has no legal status in Canada, but he receives a renewable yearly minister's permit that allows him to reside in Canada. He remains a citizen of France. The report also indicated he came to the attention of Canadian authorities in 1986 – around the time the Deschenes Commission was wrapping up its investigation into Nazi war criminals.

The report also indicated that less than two years ago, an Immigration Department lawyer studying the file recommended that Robin's case be referred to the department's B.C. office for action.

Robin, 87, has denied any wrongdoing and claims he was convicted by a postwar "kangaroo court," a contention that the Immigration Department lawyer rejected.

Irving Abella, head of the Canadian Jewish Congress war crimes committee, said he had been unfamiliar with the Robin case prior to the news report. Congress has been in contact with its counterpart in France through the World Jewish Congress to determine if they have any information about Robin.

"We don't know if he's alleged to have collaborated with the Nazis against the resistance or against Jews," Abella said.

According to the Globe and Mail, just prior to the war Robin purchased a restaurant in the southern French town of Arles, which later came inside the Vichy-controlled area.

"He said he served Germans meals and that if they were polite to him, he responded in kind. He said the accusations against him resulted from jealous townsfolk," the Globe reported.

Assistant deputy attorney general John Sims declined to comment on the case, referring all inquiries to the Ministry of Citizenship and Immigration. Denis Boucher, a spokesperson for the ministry, said, "The Access to Information and Privacy Act precludes us from commenting on this case."

So far, federal authorities have commenced legal proceedings against 14 alleged Nazi war criminals. Among them were Josef Nemsila and Antanas Kenstavicius, both of whom died before their cases were completed. Like Robin, Nemsila and Kenstavicius never became Canadian citizens.

At Nemsila's Toronto hearing, the question of domicile and whether that prevented him from being deported was raised by the defence, but because of his death, no definitive ruling was ever rendered.

Zundel barred from parliament

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The House of Commons last week passed a unanimous motion barring Holocaust-denier Ernst Zundel from "parliamentary precincts" for the duration of the current Parliament.

The motion prevented the pro-Nazi propagandist from holding a previously scheduled news conference in a press conference room in Parliament, although Zundel later held a media scrum outside the banned area.

House Leader Don Boudria said he received all-party consent to the proposal that Zundel be barred from parliament. "This is the temple of tolerance and democracy. Ernst Zundel doesn't belong in the temple of understanding and tolerance and democracy," he said.

Addressing arguments pushed by advocates of free speech who have criticized the move as setting a dangerous precedent, Boudria said, "No right is absolute, even free speech. Perhaps more importantly, because someone has the right of free speech, it doesn't mean I have to give him my microphone.

"We just didn't feel comfortable with the idea of Mr. Zundel using the parliamentary press facilities to peddle his views of history," said Bill Blaikie, New Democratic Party House Leader.

He supported the motion with some reluctance, because "we were worried he'd become a martyr."

Congress applauds motion

The House motion was applauded by Moshe Ronen, newly elected president of Canadian Jewish Congress. Ronen was in Ottawa for a series of meetings with parliamentarians to introduce himself and discuss various points of his agenda. Just prior to meeting Multiculturalism Minister Heddy Fry, he learned of the Zundel news conference and brought it to the minister's attention.

She in turn discussed it with other MPs and "right across the board, there was dismay and shock," Ronen said. "We were pleased with the swiftness with which MPs worked this through... Today Canada has spoken with one voice. We found it abhorrent that Ernst Zundel would ever have been give permission to use a parliamentary facility for his hateful activities."

A Tradition Continues

UJA FEDERATION

Vice-Chair, Human Resources

As a community we all take pride in your contributions and accomplishments. As individuals, we are all inspired by your timeless efforts and sense of tzedakah.

The Jewish Roots of Voluntarism

by Rabbi Dr. Jeremiah Unterman
Executive Director, Board of Jewish Education of UJA Federation
Vice-President, Jewish Education

The concept of voluntarism in Judaism is rooted in the inherent Jewish ethic of gemilut hasadim – bestowing loving-kindness. Such deeds, which may be understood as the practice of benevolence, are perceived in the Talmud as even superior to tzedakah – the obligation of charity.

> "Our Rabbis taught: In three respects loving-kindness is greater than charity. Charity is done with one's money, while loving-kindness may be done with one's money and one's person. Charity is given to the poor, while loving-kindness may be given both to the poor and the rich. Charity is given only to the living, while loving-kindness may be shown to both the living and the dead [that is, by attending to their funeral and burial.] (Tractate Sukkah 49b)

When we volunteer to help a friend, a neighbour, the synagogue to which we belong, the Jewish school to which we send our children, our UJA Federation, and other Jewish and communal agencies, we give of our efforts and our time. We could be relaxing instead, or attending to errands, or working longer hours at our jobs. Thus, volunteering is truly a selfless act done for the immediate benefit of others – usually of the wider Jewish and non-Jewish community.

The Jewish ethical philosophy of the practice of loving-kindness benefits both ourselves and the rest of the world. Volunteers are people who help others for no pay, selflessly. The story is told of the man who asked to see heaven and hell. An angel took him to the netherworld and showed him people sitting in front of delicious bowls of food, but they were crying because each person's arms were bound so that the arms extended straight in front – the elbows could not be bent, so no person was able to feed himself. The angel then took the man to heaven and showed him the exact same scene, except that everybody was laughing and happily talking with each other. The man was perplexed, "Why are they so happy? Their arms are also bound!" The angel responded, "Yes, but they are happy because they are feeding each other!"

May we always volunteer to help each other and may we do it often!

A NEW LOOK FOR A NEW MILLENNIUM

The approach of a new century means a revitalized look for UJA Federation's Leadership Development Award, presented to deserving community leaders since 1962.

The new award (design seen here) is a creative rendition of an unrolling scroll designed by Amy Fagin, who has been creating ketubot for more than ten years. Her art reflects the hopes and potential of new marriages, as well as a broader representation of Jewish heritage, family and community. "Scroll" was inspired by a famous passage in the Shema: "And you shall lay these words upon your heart and upon your soul."

The ketubah was a gift to UJA Federation and the community by Fagin and Michael Shapiro of Ketubah Ketubah. Founded in 1966 by Shapiro, a former marketing executive who combined his business background with his love of Judaism, people and art, Ketubah Ketubah is an on-line gallery specializing in limited editions designed by some of the world's most accomplished ketubah artists and calligraphers.

Israel At 50 Volunteers Indispensable

Zion is an Israeli university student who organized a group of young men and women to volunteer as ushers for the Night Of A Lifetime, the extravaganza celebrating Israel's 50th anniversary on April 30. When their responsibilities were over at the end of the show, they joined the festivities.

Sol, a retired senior, works tirelessly for a number of charities. At the Night Of A Lifetime, he welcomed guests and enjoyed himself so much that he volunteered to do the same at the Israel at 50 Festival at Ontario Place.

Heather, an 11 year old student follows her family's example of getting involved with community. At the Israel at 50 Festival, she spent the morning running errands at Volunteer Headquarters and the afternoon dressed up in a character costume greeting children.

These volunteers and hundreds like them have been an integral part of the Israel at 50 community-wide events held to date.

"The success of these events was due in large part to the commitment and hard work of these individuals. We simply couldn't have done it without them," notes Terri Weintraub, Chair,Volunteer Recruitment & Development for Israel at 50. "The value of this volunteer effort would translate into thousands of dollars," she adds.

Israel at 50 is a consortium of over 170 organizations under the auspices of UJA Federation and the Israeli Consulate.

CHAT a Leader in Community Service

You can find them all over the city: visiting residents in a nursing home, handling the phones at a charity telethon, inputting computer codes for a community web site, reading to the blind, coaching a junior hockey team, running a synagogue nursery, and serving meals at a homeless shelter.

They are the grade nine and ten students of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) and, as part of their school requirement, they are each contributing a minimum of 18 hours of community service to non-profit agencies across the city.

The idea for a Community Service Program surfaced during CHAT staff meetings early in the 1995-96 school year. Should the core Jewish value of helping others -gemilut hasadim- not be an essential element of a Jewish education?

In preparing the program for incoming grade nine students in September 1996, the school contacted more than 100 non-profit and charity organizations and prepared lists of available volunteer assignments. It is anticipated that, by the end of the next school year, more than 13,000 hours of CHAT volunteer work will have been performed in the community.

The organizations, both Jewish and non-Jewish, which the students are serving, express overwhelming praise for the program and the mature involvement of the CHAT students. Many have come to think of CHAT as the first place to turn when looking for volunteer help.

"We are very proud of our students," says CHAT Headmaster Rabbi Marvin Pachino. They have taken to the Community Service Program with real dedication and enthusiasm. We have also had tremendous support from our parents, as well as from the community agencies we are serving. This program has helped introduce our students to the roles that Jewish men and women are expected to play as part of their community."

Historic Conference for Young Volunteers

Every year, more and more schools are building volunteer experience into their curriculum, requiring students to devote significant hours to community work.

This increasing interest by young people obligates service agencies, schools and synagogues to find more creative approaches to developing useful volunteer placements. UJA Federation's Department for Human Resources Development is supporting this effort by holding the community's first-ever conference focused on youth voluntarism.

Scheduled for June 16, 1998 at Camp Reena, the conference will bring together the volunteer coordinators of all community service agencies to explore new approaches to absorbing larger numbers of young people into meaningful volunteer experiences. Cyrelle Bernstein, Director of Volunteer Services at Baycrest will serve as conference facilitator.

"All of our agencies are delighted that more young people are seeking volunteer opportunities. The challenge to us is to ensure that young people are engaged in activities that have educational validity and that encourage participants to maintain their interest as they mature into adulthood," says Shelly Rotman, conference convenor.

Information on the conference is available by calling (416) 635-2883 ext. 137.

YOU Can Be More Than One!

YOU CAN ... share your expertise or talents ... offer your time to someone who needs you ...gain experience or develop new skills ... make new friends and contacts ...experience the satisfaction that comes from helping others ...develop a stronger connection to our Jewish community.

The Volunteer Referral Service of UJA Federation's Department for Human Resources Development can connect YOU to a meaningful volunteer placement. Here are some:

- CARE TO DRIVE? Volunteers are needed to provide escort/transportation to appointments, programs, social activities, or delivering meals to seniors.
- BE A SPECIAL FRIEND. Provide regular social contact to homebound seniors or to seniors in institutional settings.
- OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH available in schools, shuls, day care centres, hospitals and in various community agencies. All talents and skills welcome.

To explore these and other community opportunities for volunteers of ALL ages, call Shelly Rotman at UJA Federation (416) 635-2883 ext. 137 or visit our web site at Jewish Toronto www.feduja.org

What's "HOT" at UJA Federation

Hands-On Toronto (HOT) is an exciting new UJA Federation initiative, providing its young members, aged 23-39, with the opportunity to perform mitzvot by taking a pro-active "hands-on" approach.

Sponsored by UJA Federation's Young Leadership Cabinet, its goal is to match the interests and talents of its volunteers with the needs of the community. To date, nine community projects have been held with Jewish Family & Child Service, the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre of Toronto, Jewish Vocational Service, Mount Sinai Hospital, and BBYO.

Marcie Sommers, who co-chairs HOT with Cory Gurevitz, notes, "I am proud to be representing HOT. I take great satisfaction in seeing faces light up when a young person lends a hand to someone in need."

Fall programs are now in the initial stages of development. If you are interested in participating, call Elana Carr at UJA Federation (416) 631-5736.

...And let there be a cruise like this ...

McCabe Bremer Travel and Orient Lines have listened to the call of the observant Kosher traveler. Depart North America October 25th to embark on the journey of a lifetime:

Athens — Thousands of years of history feel real as you stare at the Parthenon - the crown of Acropolis. See the Greece of yesteryear and today before boarding the elegant Marco Polo to sail to the Land of Israel passing the pearls of the Mediterranean.

Israel — Savour Jerusalem on Israel's 50th Birthday. Get recharged by our history, culture and the people whose love and determination re-built this land. Or, make it a short visit to relatives not seen for a while.

The Pyramids — No dusty caravans, biting camels. Rather, sail across the Suez Canal to visit the Land of Egypt. This is where we built cities for Raamses, suffered slavery and prospered from time to time as distinguished scholars, doctors, merchants or even as the current (Shomer Shabbat) U.S. Ambassador to Egypt.

Petra — Like our forefathers, we leave Egypt through the Red Sea to Aqaba. Visit Petra, the fascinating Nabatean city carved into red rock and hidden deep in the desert.

Djibouti — The land of the Afars and Issas and the largest refueling port on the Red Sea has a mix of African, Arab and French cultures, an exotic market and good duty-free shopping.

Mombasa — Gateway to Kenya has been a trading centre for centuries - Persians, Turks, Indians, Portuguese and Jews have all left their mark. Ancient forts, museums and temples abound. Bargain for brightly coloured kangas and custom woodcarvings. Spend Shabbat in a lovely beach resort with candlelighting to herald sunset over the Indian Ocean.

Tsavo National Park — Set up your camera for crocodiles, elephants, baboons, antelope, giraffes, hippos and colourful butterflies within sight of Mt. Kilimanjaro. The terrain is dotted with baobab trees (some up to 1,000 years old) and red termite mounts (5 ft. tall).

Amboseli National Park — In the shadow of Mt. Kilimanjaro catch the most dramatic settings in the morning before the clouds set in. There is nothing as majestic as a parade of elephants emerging from dawn darkness, or the graceful flight of an impala fawn.

Throughout the journey we learn from our expert local guides and gain a Jewish perspective with the help of Rabbi Moshe Stern. We dine on fine Kosher cuisine and live in casual elegance while discovering intriguing and exotic countries and visiting Jewish communities living in strange lands.

This is the trip for creating memories even for travelers with full passports.

Midnight – a fictional account

By SONIA SHVARTS

It seems as if the world were breaking a promise, a promise that encouraged me to live every day of my life. What has become of this gleaming promise of hope that would have let me live my little luminous and lighthearted life?

Guest Voices

I could never forget that day. It was the Thursday morning of Jan. 17, 1940. Mother was preparing for Shabbat and Father was cleaning the house. He had recently been fired from work. Ever since Hitler came to power, every Jewish man, woman, and even child was banned from working and going to school.

Life really changed when Hitler came to power. No one expected that his power would have so much impact that it could make our lives turn right around and head straight for a cliff.

My sister Jenny and I were gazing out the window, enjoying what could only be seen. The sun's golden rays shone down onto the clean, pure,white snow. Then that scene of the outdoors changed unexpectedly. Large trucks appeared, and a whole row of soldiers stood abreast. Holding their guns, they split up, and marched and marched and marched.

I swept down the stairs to inform Mother and Father, but it was too late. Armed soldiers were knocking viciously at the door. Without waiting for a reply, they tore down the door. They grabbed us and forced us into the trucks.

I was confused, unaware of what was going on. Every face around me was either confused or shocked, but mostly scared. I guess I was scared, too, but shocked, as well. All those emotions were too much for me to handle. I began to shed a tear.

The trucks took us to cattle cars. It seemed unreal that all these men, women and children would just be thrown into them, impossible. Yet, it was possible. The soldiers threw us into the cattle cars as if we were animals or sacks of wheat. Some children were crying, others were shocked and still confused. Parents were comforting distressed children, but with such pale faces that their warm parental touch of love could not soothe the children. My mother would not show her real feelings, but I could tell she was not well.

Mother had history of heart problems. She had recently recovered from a stroke that she had had when she found out that the Germans had invaded Hungary. Hungary was where my grandparents aunts, and uncles once lived. Now only G-d knew where they were.

Once everybody had gotten onto the trains, the trains began to move. The sharp sounds of the wheels moving swiftly on the tracks were drowned out by the beautiful prayers the rabbis began to utter. I suddenly found myself cherishing those words, for they might be the last prayers I would ever hear.

That night I awakened in fear and denial. It was midnight. Midnight was such a scary place. I wished the night would end, so I could live in daylight, which was full of joy, laughter, and sunlight. But midnight was dark and quiet. All that could be heard were the owls calling. Midnight was full of dreams that were rich in ambition and faith, and nightmares that haunted you forever. When would this dark, lonesome, scary place disappear? Would I ever be able to feel daylight again, not just see it?

I did not sleep well through that night, but I guessed I wasn't the only one. Beside me lay Mother, with Father by her side. Jenny tried to break off icicles for Mother to drink. Mother had suffered a stroke. She looked so dreadfully pale and her hands shook. The sight of my beautiful mother unable to open big, dark blue eyes made me feel numbness in my legs.

I knelt down beside her, took her cold hands and said, "Mama, Mama…"

"Don't speak, my child. I know, and you know, that I will not make it. Remember, there will always be a star shining down on you at midnight. It is true, I will not make it, but my soul, my faith, will live on forever, to help you and Jenny survive." Those were the last words she managed to say.

My heart thumped. The train stopped. It seemed as if we had been in the train for years, but in reality it was only three days. Three days of hunger, thirst and death. The wide doors opened. A cold chill entered the stuffed cattle car. As Jenny, Father and I walked out, we realized that we were in Auschwitz. This would be it. Smoke came from tall chimneys, children and old people ran in the snow, pencil thin in striped outfits. Children yelled for parents, brothers and sisters. Parents yelled for their children.

The dreadful sight, the terror, but why? What did innocent people do to deserve this? We weren't thieves or criminals. What, were we guilty of being Jews? Was that a crime?

Sitting on the porch with my youngest daughter on a late summery evening, recalling bitter times in my past life, she interrupted in an excited voice, "Mommy, Mommy, look up at the big blue midnight sky! Look at the big star shining above us…"

Three exhibits open at Winnipeg museum

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — More than 500 people came out recently for the official opening of three new exhibits at the Ed and Marion Vickar Jewish Museum of Western Canada.

Opening were the permanent display, Diversity and Vitality: The Jewish Experience in Western Canada; a temporary display, A Seed in the Pocket of Their Blood, a tribute to Israel's 50th birthday; and the new Holocaust Education Centre.

The museum is housed in the Asper Jewish Community Campus. The Holocaust Education Centre will have exhibits depicting life before, during and after the war, and will feature a multimedia presentation for school groups.

Museum spokesperson Faye Rosenberg-Cohen says efforts are also being made to put together a portable version of the program for Hersh Zentner and other Holocaust educators to take to schools.

The permanent exhibit is built around a number of themes that depict the Jewish experience in western Canada.

"We are showing different facets of Jewish urban and rural life, Jewish organizational life and Jewish contributions to the wider community," Rosenberg-Cohen says.

"Considering we are small in numbers in the west, it is amazing what we have accomplished."

One of the museum's treasures is a menorah made in 1896 for the Jewish community that was then in the southern Manitoba town of Morden.

"We are always looking for more artifacts," says Rosenberg-Cohen. "We expect to be reconfiguring our permanent collection over the years to make room for travelling exhibits and present different aspects of our history. For the summer of 1999, for example, we are planning an exhibit highlighting Jewish athletes in conjunction with the Pan-American Games being held here."

A highlight of the A Seed in the Pocket of Their Blood exhibit was the presence of creator Rafi Aaron at the opening. Aaron is a poet and photographer living in Toronto. The exhibit is based on his book of the same name which combines photos of Israel and related poems.

Rosenberg-Cohen notes that Aaron's 99-year-old zayde, Benjamin Feinstein, to whom the book is dedicated, started life in Canada in Winkler in southern Manitoba.

Two Jewish families were particularly helpful to him, Aaron says. He was able to meet with Percy Goldberg and Paula Mitchell, members of those two families, at the opening.

Tamir opens group home

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA – The Tamir Foundation recently held an open house to introduce its latest group home to the community here.

Every detail of the extensively renovated double house is proof of the planning, forethought and caring that make the building a home.

Founded in 1980, the Tamir Foundation provides residential care for Jewish adults with developmental disabilities. The foundation maintains several residences, in addition to the newest addition.

Located directly across the street from the Jewish Community Centre now under construction, the new home is in an ideal situation to fulfil its mandate of integrating the residents into the Jewish community, according to Tamir Foundation president Gilda Good.

"This is the first time we know of that an organization serving people with developmental disabilities will be tied into a JCC. It is unique in North America," Good says.

Residents will be able to participate in a wide variety of social, cultural and athletic activities at the JCC and will get to know, and be known by, members of the Jewish community.

Tamir's executive director, Mark Palmer, says the home "is on the cutting edge. Other agencies are coming to see this house because it is a model; it is an unusual, innovative partnership.

"Funded by the Ministry of Community and Social Services, the Ottawa Vaad Ha'Ir and the Tamir Foundation, this is the next wave of partnership between government and community, and the Jewish community is showing leadership in this regard," Palmer says.

Tamir has brought residents out of institutions, out of isolation and back into their community. Jay Greenblatt, for example, has been away from his family for decades, but the home has allowed him to be reunited with them. Family members are welcome to join in holiday celebrations, Shabbat dinners or just to visit.

Lesley and Jack Cramer's son Michael has been a Tamir resident for the past year. "This place has a warm, homey feeling. The staff are so very caring," Lesley says.

Founding president Lily Penso marvels at what Tamir Foundation has achieved. "I never dreamed that it would expand to this extent and help so many families," she says.

The new home is esthetically beautiful and has the most modern equipment It is both functional and attractive and blends perfectly into the neighborhood. However, the most important aspect of the home, those involved believe, is the caring and dedication of the board, the staff, the volunteers and the families of residents who all have the same goals: integration into the community in general and the Jewish community in particular.

With the proximity of the new JCC, the Hillel Academy day school and the future possibility of Hillel Lodge seniors residence, there will be ample opportunity for the Tamir residents to fulfil that goal.

Plotnick added that a small delegation from Montreal, including Hecht, would meet this week in Israel "with the appropriate people, to reinforce, verbally and face-to-face, some of the issues we have outlined in our presentations."

Shiron said that suspending the decision was due to "some reconsideration" within the Foreign Ministry. But he acknowledged that the storm of protest coming from the Jewish community here, led by Plotnick and Hecht, and from the other sites, may have played a part in the ministry reviewing its decision.

But he said that while such reactions are taken into account, they are not the overriding factor.

Shiron indicated a final decision will be made after "consultations" involving Israel's top Foreign Ministry bureaucrat, director-general Eytan Ben-Tsur, and the acting foreign minister, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

For the time being, however, "the whole thing has been put on ice," Shiron said.

In Montreal, Israeli Consul General Daniel Gal said that suspending the decision to close the consulate was "good, not for me personally, but for the Jewish community.

"I am a civil servant," he said, "but I am very pleased for the Jewish community and for this region of Quebec."

Hecht said he hoped to have the chance during his trip to meet with Netanyahu personally to obtain guarantees, "once and for all and unequivocally, to keep the consulate permanently open."

Plotnick said the issue should become a "permanent one for non-discussion. I think we'll be able to achieve that."

Rabbi says goodbye

By SUZANNE KORT
Pacific Correspondent

Rabbi Victor Reinstein, his wife, author Susan Berrin, and their three children are leaving Victoria this summer after 16 years of dedicated involvement in Jewish life here.

The family will be moving to Boston, Mass., where the couple feel their children will be better able to pursue their Jewish education.

Victorians were invited to say good bye at two special events – the kiddush meal following Shabbat morning services at Congregation Emanu-El on June 6, and a formal tea at the synagogue on June 7.

"That's the way we started; that's the way we should end," Craig said, referring to the bar mitzvah of her son Josh, the first event at which Rabbi Reinstein officiated, two weeks after arriving in Victoria in 1982.

Though the Craigs had no family in town and little money to spare at the time, over 200 people showed up to help celebrate, each bringing food to share.

The new community's spirit impressed the Reinstein-Berrin family. "The degree of involvement, enthusiasm and cooperation is truly impressive. I am honored to work with and be part of such a community," wrote Rabbi Reinstein in the August 1982 issue of Congregation Emanu-El's newsletter, Koleinu (our voice).

Many Victoria citizens of all faiths have since come to know the Reinstein-Berrins and have been moved by their warmth and spirituality.

Taking the pain out of hip and knee surgery

Mention the word surgery and people immediately think of pain – it is going to hurt. With the wide variety of pain control medications available today, this is no longer the case.

To Your Health

To Your Health asked Dr. Susan Haley, director of the Anesthesia Pain Program and deputy chief of anesthesia at Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital, to outline some of the new pain control options for patients undergoing hip and knee surgery at the hospital.

Before having a knee or hip replacement at Mount Sinai, patients should meet with a Pain Service professional to find out what options are available to help them control their pain following surgery.

The medication they need will depend on their pain tolerance and what stage they are at in the recovery process. At the hospital, a Pain Service nurse will discuss the options with patients during their visit to the preadmission unit before surgery. The goal is to make sure a patient experiences as little pain as possible to ensure a more comfortable patient, faster recovery time and a shorter stay in the hospital.

With knee and hip surgery, it is crucial that patients are mobile as soon as possible after surgery. Delays in getting patients moving following their surgery may slow down their recovery process and result in increased pain.

Knee and hip replacement patients are monitored daily by the Acute Pain Service team following their surgery at the hospital. During their recuperation, they may use a variety of the following options to successfully control their pain:

Patient Controlled Analgesia (PCA) Pump: Also known as the pain pump, a PCA pump allows patients to dispense pain medication when they need it, rather than having to call or wait for a nurse to give them an injection. The computerized pump is placed at the patient's bedside. When patients need pain relief, they press a button on a handset that releases a small amount of pain medication through a tube into a vein. The medication is computer programmed so that patients cannot over-medicate themselves. Patients who have hip or knee replacements often receive a PCA pump.

Femoral Nerve Block: In the recovery room after surgery, the anesthetist may insert a tube in the groin area of the patient that will provide continuous pain medication for two to three days after surgery. A femoral nerve block works especially well for knee surgery patients.

Epidural Anesthesia: An epidural provides patients with continuous pain medication through a tube inserted into the lower back. This type of pain relief is usually used in special cases, such as bilateral knee reconstruction.

Oral Medication: Within 12 to 24 hours of undergoing hip and knee surgery, patients usually start to reduce their reliance on other pain medications and switch to taking oral medications. Typically, three days after surgery, they are using only oral medication to manage their pain.

By the time patients are ready to leave the hospital, they have their pain well under control.

The bottom line, says Haley, is that anyone contemplating surgery should find out how their pain will be controlled before their operation, regardless of where they are having the procedure done.

Hospital beds to stay open

MONTREAL — Those 22 beds reopened at Maimonides Hospital Geriatric Centre (MHGC) in March for a six-month period will now stay open until at least next February and 13 additional beds will reopen this August. Additional funding is being allocated by the health ministry to make this possible.

The beds, located on the 5 North wing, were closed three years ago after the Quebec government ordered the long-term care institution to reduce a $1.3-million deficit.

In February, Health Minister Jean Rochon decreed that the 35 beds be reopened as part of a plan to ease overcrowding in hospital emergency rooms by reopening 200 chronic care beds in Montreal. Funding was ensured for six months only.

However, only 22 beds were reopened at MHGC because of an unexpected government order at the end of February to the Jewish General Hospital (JGH) to transfer 35 frail elderly patients within a few days.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. With the warm weather upon us, my children really like to have popsicles and freezies. I feel that these are really empty calories. Do you have a healthier suggestion?

A. There are a lot of very healthful frozen desserts available today. Many popsicle-type desserts are made from pure fruit juice and provide vitamins and minerals. It is also very easy to make your own popsicles using pure fruit juice or freshly squeezed juices.

The other option is to choose yogurt or ice cream-type frozen desserts that pack healthful calcium and protein.

Q. I know it is important to drink a lot of fluids in the warm weather. What is the best choice?

A. Water is really the best choice in most situations. Sports drinks can be useful to replace electrolytes lost in rigorous, long-term activity. For most people, water is the best way to keep hydrated this summer.

Q. You always hear people recommend eating chicken skinless. I am wondering exactly how much fat is actually in the skin?

A. Preparing 3.5 ounces of light meat roasted with the skin contains 222 calories and 10.9 grams of fat. The 3.5 ounces of light meat roasted without the skin contains 173 calories and 4.5 grams of fat. The skin does contribute more than double the amount of fat in the chicken alone.

Third pullback emerges as obstacle to agreement

By JAY BUSHINSKY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The depth and timing of the third pullback from the West Bank has emerged as the last major obstacle to an agreement by Israel, the United States and the Palestinian Authority (PA) that would pave the way to final-status talks.

But Palestinian insistence on receiving substantially more than the additional two percent believed to have been offered by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu dampened official hopes of an early breakthrough.

"I am still optimistic," a senior government aide said. He blamed the media for "creating the impression that a deal is imminent."

A meeting last Sunday between cabinet secretary Danny Naveh and the chief PA negotiator Saeb Erekat, at U.S. Ambassador Edward Walker's official residence, indicated that the two sides are interested in American ideas.

The session focused on the interim agreement and on the unresolved issues of a seaport, an airport and an industrial zone in Gaza. The last time these issues were discussed was two months ago. According to sources, the Americans initiated that meeting.

Meanwhile, there were unconfirmed reports that Israel recently held secret talks with European Union (EU) officials and agreed to discuss the airport, seaport and industrial zone, in an attempt to reach an agreement with the Palestinians, to prevent the EU from imposing sanctions on settlement products.

Netanyahu told the weekly cabinet meeting that while there still are differences about the second redeployment's precise parameters, the negotiations' current focus is on the third withdrawal.

"I cannot say that Israel and the Palestinians are on the verge of an agreement," he said. "There is as yet no agreement on the second redeployment. Israel is directing its efforts toward reaching agreement with the United States on the third redeployment. The issue here is the scope of the [third] redeployment, as well as the way in which it will be determined. Israel is making great efforts, and on this matter there is a chance that progress will be made."

Earlier Erekat had said on the Voice of Palestine radio that the "ball is in the Israeli court," as the Palestinians had already agreed to the U.S. proposals and it is up to Israel to declare its intentions regarding redeployment.

He said that according to the recent U.S. initiative, Israel must transfer land from Area C (under sole Israeli control) and Area B (under Palestinian civil control and Israeli security control) in the second redeployment.

Netanyahu's effort to reconcile Israel's vital security requirements with PA territorial aspirations and U.S. interest in forging an agreement without further delay failed to impress National Infrastructure Minister Ariel Sharon.

After a meeting behind closed doors, Sharon contended that "all the possibilities have not been exhausted and there are solutions which have not been tried."

He implied that Israel is being put into an untenable situation. He believes that a nine percent pullback is the most that can be offered. He also spelled out his grievances against the current trend in the redeployment negotiations in a detailed statement to the cabinet.

"We have to stop talking about nine percent, 11 percent, and 13 percent," he said, "because within a short time [PA Chairman Yasser] Arafat will have more than 40 percent of Judea and Samaria without giving anything in exchange."

Sharon also complained that the authorized policy-making organs of government are not being consulted about the parameters of withdrawal.

"If there is any kind of agreement with the Palestinians and Americans before any governmental forum whatsoever reaches a decision, the government will not be able to oppose it afterward. After exhaustive negotiations in which the United States is actively involved, it will be impossible to turn it around and change it.

"A bizarre and unhealthy situation has been created: Everybody knows – the Americans, Palestinians, Egyptians. The only ones who do not know are the members of the government, in any of its component bodies."

He predicted "a grave crisis" after the pullback is completed, because of Arafat's "known position" regarding the final settlement, his refusal to convene the Palestinian National Council [to expunge the anti-Israel articles from the Palestinian Covenant] and his rejection of Israel's calls for "reciprocity."

Netanyahu countered by saying the inner cabinet will be convened to update its members on the course of the negotiations.

General Security Services head Ami Ayalon, who attended the cabinet session, raised the possibility that Hebron's Shuhada Street might be reopened to Palestinian traffic, as stipulated in the Hebron agreement.

This idea was opposed by Transport Minister Shaul Yahalom, who advocated maintaining the status quo.

Conversion issue ready to explode

By AVI MACHLIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Efforts to forge a compromise over the ongoing conversion controversy in Israel appear ready to explode.

The Conservative movement has returned to court to battle for the recognition of its conversions in Israel. In response, the government plans to revive legislation that would codify the Orthodox monopoly over conversions in Israel.

The latest developments suggest that nearly one year after a truce was called in an effort to reach a compromise in the battle over religious pluralism, the parties are back where they started.

The conversion bill could be revived "within days" if the Conservative and Reform movements do not withdraw their conversion cases from court, according to Bobby Brown, the prime minister's adviser on Diaspora affairs.

Political analysts said the move could spark a new coalition crisis within the government because some coalition partners such as Yisrael b'Aliyah, the party headed by Natan Sharansky, oppose the conversion bill.

In fact, the fate of any conversion legislation is very uncertain because a majority of Knesset members have said they opposed such legislation.

But Netanyahu has been under pressure from haredi parties to bring back the bill.

Legislation had been frozen since last year, when the government appointed a committee headed by Finance Minister Ya'acov Ne'eman to draw up a compromise.

After months of intense meetings and missed deadlines, the commission in January recommended establishing a joint interdenominational conversion institute under the auspices of the Jewish Agency for Israel. While rabbis from the Orthodox, Conservative and Reform movements would participate in training potential converts, the actual conversion process would remain under Orthodox control.

Israel's Reform and Conservative movements accepted the compromise in principle, but demanded that Israel's Orthodox chief rabbis endorse the recommendations.

In early February, Israel's Chief Rabbinate Council did not comment on the institute per se, but lashed out at "those who are trying to shake the foundations of the Jewish people."

Last week, Israel's High Court of Justice renewed deliberation on the recognition of Conservative conversions of babies adopted abroad. The session was technical, involving the state's submission of its explanations on the issue.

However, the significance was more than just technical. It represented the Conservative movement's decision to press ahead in court after freezing the case while the Ne'eman Committee tried to hammer out a compromise.

"We have no choice but to pursue a court decision," said Rabbi Ehud Bandel, president of Masorti, as the Conservative movement is known in Israel.

"We are the only ones who agreed to the Ne'eman Committee's conclusions. We conditioned our agreement on a similar agreement from the [Orthodox] Chief Rabbinate. The moment they rejected the Ne'eman Committee, it is as if there are no recommendations."

The conversion institute's board has held several meetings in recent weeks. Conservative and Reform delegates have attended, but insist that their participation does not imply the problem has been solved.

Netanyahu said that he would consider pushing the Ne'eman recommendation through legislation alongside the conversion bill.

But Rabbi Bandel said if this happened, he would be in a "strange alliance" with the haredi parties, who object to such a move.

The Orthodox object because they reject the Ne'eman compromise proposals. Rabbi Bandel and the Conservatives say they object because legalizing the Ne'eman recommendations would only be "symbolic," while the conversion law would in fact delegitimate non-Orthodox conversions.

For his part, Avraham Burg, chairman of the Jewish Agency, warned that the confrontation would widen the gulf between Israel and Jews throughout the world.

"Every headline, each remark against Conservative and Reform Jews, only adds dozens of miles to the distance between us and the majority of the Jews of the world who are not Orthodox," Burg said.

Israel seeks Hussein's help

By ARIEH O'SULLIVAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

AMMAN — Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai flew to Amman last Sunday to seek King Hussein's help in brokering a deal with the Palestinians on the second redeployment.

"I got the sense that the king is concerned about the situation," Mordechai told military reporters who accompanied him to Amman. "But just like in the Hebron agreement and other instances, the king is prepared to help."

During their relatively short, one-hour meeting at King Hussein's newly built Gate of Peace Palace on the western edge of Amman, Mordechai and the king tried to flesh out ideas on just how the Jordanian monarch could contribute.

While not soliciting King Hussein's pressure on Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat, the Israelis are hoping the king will be able to make the Palestinians more "flexible and understanding"so they accept the Israeli plan for a second withdrawal, one government official said.

Palestinian officials said Arafat had turned down a U.S. request to attend last Sunday's meeting between King Hussein and Mordechai.

In the meantime, Mordechai was acting more cautiously and did not have the same upbeat attitude as when he returned from Cairo last week, where he said the time for decisions was at hand.

Mordechai said the agreement on a second IDF redeployment in the West Bank would be achieved "shortly," but declined to be more specific.

Speaking at an impromptu news conference, King Hussein called Mordechai his "very good friend," adding that "after hearing Defence Minister Mordechai I am more optimistic."

Mordechai appears to be the solid force spearheading implementation of the pullback and is considered the leading moderate in Netanyahu's cabinet.

Still, it is not clear just how much influence he has in the government, particularly after he failed to follow through with a threat in January to resign if the troop pullback in the West Bank did not take place within three months.

The Jordanians have much respect for Mordechai, a former general, and Mordechai and King Hussein have meet on a number of occasions, not all of them official or reported.

The visit to Amman was also used to enhance security relations between the two nations.

Israel-Canada trade links booming

BY EDGAR ASHER
CJN Israel Correspondent

TEL AVIV — The deepening and expanding business relationship between Canada and Israel was evident recently when the Israel-Canada Chamber of Commerce and Industry held a gala dinner to celebrate Israel's jubilee.

At the dinner, the chamber's awards for business excellence and success in promoting trade and economic relations between Israel and Canada were presented for the first time.

"The amount of trade between our two countries is now at a substantial level and worth celebrating," said Canadian ambassador David Berger. "The Canada-Israel Free Trade Agreement [CIFTA] led to a 56-percent increase in Canadian exports to Israel. So, as we had hoped, the CIFTA is contributing to increased trade between our countries."

CIFTA was implemented on Jan. 1, 1997, and bilateral trade reached $441 million that year. Canadian companies are involved in several infrastructure projects.

One of the award winners was Montreal-based David Azrieli, who was recognized for "his outstanding personal and business contribution to retail trading in Israel."

Last March, Azrieli, who has already opened several malls in major centres in the country, opened his newest, a 250,000-square-foot shopping mall in Tel Aviv.

Other Montreal-based award recipients were Charles Bronfman and Jonathan Kolber of Claridge Israel Inc. This award, which was accepted by Kolber, Claridge's CEO in Israel, was in recognition of the company's acquiring a controlling interest in the Koor conglomerate. Claridge is now the single largest foreign investor in Israel.

John Beck of Canadian Highways Investment Corporation and Israeli businessman Lev Leviev of Africa Israel Investments were award winners for their joint successful tender for the Cross Israel Highway. This massive project, now underway, is constructing a toll highway linking the north of Israel to the south.

Four Israeli companies, Tadiran Communications Ltd., Malam Software Systems, Eyal Optical industry and Shamir Optical Industry received awards and commendations for their outstanding increase in exports to Canada. A fifth company, Tosaf Compounds Ltd., also received an award for growth in exports to Canada, as well as for its opening of a very successful industrial plant in Canada.

Israel's Arab minority feels alienated

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

Last month, as Israel celebrated 50 years of statehood, Israeli Arabs marked al-nakba, the catastrophe that befell their community in 1948. As Israel battled Palestinian irregulars and five Arab armies that had invaded its territory, Palestinian civilians ran for their lives, voluntarily or involuntarily, leaving behind more than 400 villages, as well as 160,000 of their compatriots.

The Palestinian Arabs who remained formed the nucleus of the Muslim and Christian minority that has grown in size to about one million inhabitants, or nearly 20 percent of Israel's total population.

As their al-nakba festival showed, Arabs in Israel feel acutely torn between their identities as ethnic Palestinians and Israelis.

Israel's Declaration of Independence conferred "complete equality" on Israeli Arabs. But in practice, they do not enjoy equal rights with the Jewish majority. As a result, they are a largely disaffected minority with a litany of legitimate complaints about their status.

"There are no laws that discriminate explicitly against non-Jewish citizens," writes political scientist Alan Dowty, "but the statutes that uphold Israel's Jewishness promote inequality by legitimizing preference for Jews."

As an example, while Jews are citizens on the basis of descent, Arabs are citizens by virtue of physical presence, a regulation designed to prevent an influx of Palestinian refugees into Israel.

The continuing state of war between Israel and many of its Arab neighbors doubtless sows suspicion about their loyalty, even though few Israeli Arabs have been charged with security infractions.

Until 1966, their freedom of movement was circumscribed and they lived under military rule. And while such blatant restrictions are a thing of the past, Israeli Arabs harbor deep-seated grievances, from the expropriation of much of their land in the first three decades of Israel's existence to job discrimination, an unemployment rate far above the national average, inferior schools in terms of expenditure per pupil and facilities, unequal municipal budgetary allocations, and virtual exclusion from key government positions and senior university posts.

And ironically enough, because most Israeli Arabs are exempt from national service, they are denied important benefits in employment, housing and education during young adulthood.

Despite these disadvantages, they have achieved a measure of progress. In May, the first Arab judge was elevated to the Supreme Court, and in April, the army appointed its second Druze general in a year and its first Christian Arab woman as an officer. Two years ago, Israel's first Arab ambassador was posted to Finland.

Although Israeli Arabs account for more than half of those below the poverty line, they are, as a group better off than Arabs in Arab countries. These advances have had the effect of increasing their self-confidence, their sense of Palestinization and their willingness to voice criticism of the system.

In general, Israeli Arabs identify neither with Zionism nor with Israel's flag, and in the 1996 election, during which they won 10 Knesset seats, 60 percent of them voted for non-Zionist political parties. Some radicals, such as Said Zeidani, have called for territorial autonomy in the Galilee and the Little Triangle, where the vast majority of Israeli Arabs live, in separate communities apart from Jews. Still others, notably MK Abdul Wahab Darawashe, have expressed support for an independent Palestinian state and the return of Palestinian refugees to their former homeland.

Sammy Smooha, a Haifa University social scientist, divides Israeli Arabs into four major groups. Roughly 11 percent accept Israel as it is constituted. Thirty nine percent seek change within the existing framework. Forty percent reject Israel's Jewish-Zionist character. Ten percent reject Israel altogether.

Al Green Artist

It is now more than 30 years since Al Green has dedicated his life to sculpting. His appreciation for fine design and art has always been an integral part of his life, ever since he was involved in construction of some of the most prestigious development projects in and around Toronto. During his formative years as a sculptor, he studied and was guided by Maryon Kantaroff. Later, when he began to seriously devote his talents and time to his love for art forms, he had the good fortune to further his studies with the world renown sculptor, Sorel Etrog. In his well equipped studio he developed his own personal style which is reflected in "Touching Heaven", a commission dedicated to the Lubavitch Organization. His cubistic and angular style are exciting to view, while emotionally evocative. Al's enthusiasm for fine design has led him to utilize a wide range of materials, while he continues to explore new forms of design and unconventional materials.

He has to his credit more than 100 works of art and has participated in many shows. As a result of his commitment to education, health and Jewish life, Al has completed commissions for several organizations. His work is in many private collections in Canada and the United States. Recently, he completed a 14 ft. totem pole and an elaborate abstract piece called 'Homage to a Higher Power' which was featured at his last exhibition.

HOLOCAUST PLAY WINS PLAYWRITING CONTEST

Maurice Breslow, a transplanted New Yorker who teaches drama at Queen's University in Kingston, Ont., has penned a play, Suffer The Children, which has been named winner of the 1997 Canadian Jewish playwriting contest sponsored by the Jewish Theatre Committee of Toronto.

Suffer The Children focuses on Chaim Rumkowski, the controversial head of the Judenrat in the wartime Lodz Ghetto. Breslow decided to focus on Rumkowski after reading The War Against The Jews, Lucy Dawidowicz's book on the Holocaust. He interviewed numerous survivors from Lodz and combed the YIVO Archives in New York, seeking relevant material in Yiddish, which he read with the help of a translator.

"For me, Rumkowski embodies the best and the worst of our confrontation with the Nazis," Breslow said. "I wanted to get beyond the faceless facts to the personal and public truths they represented." Most of Breslow's father's family was wiped out in the Holocaust.

The committee is planning to present a staged reading of Suffer The Children during Holocaust Education Week in November, in conjunction with its sponsor, the Bloor Jewish Community Centre.

In the Spotlight: A rabbi in London, England, has voluntarily stopped leading religious services at his synagogue after members of the rabbinical council complained that some ideas in his book on sexuality and Torah were "inappropriate" for a rabbi and not "in accordance with Jewish law."

Rabbi Shmuel Boteach said he would no longer officiate at Shabbat services at Willesden United Synagogue in order to protect British Chief Rabbi Jonathan Sacks, who had praised him as "one of the more creative and imaginative talents of our community [who] has been prepared to take risks in order to communicate an authentic Jewish message to a new generation."

Boteach's book, Kosher Sex, discusses such subjects as oral sex, masturbation and "whether there is a 'kosher kama sutra,'" the London Jewish Chronicle reported. "The book argues that the rabbinical line restricting sex to the missionary position represents advice, not Jewish law." Sections of the book were serialized in a British tabloid.

Rabbi Boteach had also introduced more informal Shabbat services at his synagogue. "He brought a breath of fresh air," one congregant said.

In a prepared statement, Rabbi Boteach said, "I categorically reject the suggestion that Kosher Sex contains material contrary to Jewish teachings, and am prepared to debate those making this scurrilous assertion in a public forum."

He also complained that rabbis were abrogating responsibility for guiding people in their intimate lives and called for an honest and open approach in addressing issues of sexuality and intimacy.

"I think that rabbis should leave sex therapy to sex therapists," said Elkan Levy, president of the United Synagogues.

Toronto's dirty '30s recreated

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO —The world of the dirty '30s in Toronto, when Jews couldn't get a job at Eatons or Simpsons, and when renting out a flat was crucial for the family income, is recreated in The Dreamers.

In his partly autobiographical piece, the 82-year-old writer and actor Irving Hoffman tells a familiar (almost too familiar) story of the struggles of a Jewish family living on Clinton and Grace streets.

The latest version of The Dreamers, first presented in 1995, is sharper in political tone, expounding the virulent anti-Semitism of the period, the intense debate over Communism and the Christie Pits riots.

But the play is not a "downer." How could it be with such a lovable and warm family as the Gordons looking at the upside of matriarch Emma working in a Spadina Avenue dress factory for $6 a week, the 17-year-old son, Benny, handling three jobs to pay for an acting course, and the father, Harry, losing his post with the Toronto Symphony?

Ivanoffski, 46, a member of a non-Jewish Hungarian immigrant family "adopted" by Jewish friends in North York schools, thinks The Dreamers should be seen by young Jews and by the large Jewish immigrant community who settled in Toronto after World War II.

"It will make them realize the economic forces that held Jews together in those days and enabled them to survive," said Ivanoffski, a former historian.

Experienced veteran actors Gloria Valentine (Emma), Irving Hoffman (Grandpa Gordon), Harriet Sherman (Grandma Gordon), and Stanley Mourin combine with younger cast members in an intergenerational mix which matches the Gordon family itself.

All in all, Hoffman has written a gritty yet humorous look at the depression era, when the Gordons could rent a 10-room house on Grace Street for $52 a month. They could afford the rent only by taking in boarders and renting out a flat. The Stromberg-Carlson radio (a floor model), the dial telephones and the old-fashioned upright piano will surely evoke nostalgia.

The play has all the ups and downs of family life in those days, including a happy ending. For anyone who yearns for the classic Jewish theatre of laughs and tears, it's a must.

The Dreamers is not innovative enough to make Broadway or the Royal Alex, but that's not its purpose.

Violist Golani to perform with TSO

By STACEY STEIN
Student Intern

TORONTO — For the first time in 10 years, viola virtuoso Rivka Golani will be performing with the Toronto Symphony Orchestra (TSO).

This may seem curious, considering the Tel Aviv-born violist lives partly in Toronto (her other home is in London) when she's not on the road.

"It was a bit weird that I lived in Toronto and didn't perform with the orchestra," Golani concedes. "But it was for political reasons, not musical reasons."

In Toronto, Golani has been performing with the Esprit Orchestra. Then the CBC invited her to perform and record a viola concerto written for her by Canadian composer Peter Paul Koprowski, resulting in the June 13 engagement with the TSO.

The CBC also asked her to record a two-CD set featuring all of Bach's solo works. The project is expected to be ongoing for the next year and a half, beginning in the fall.

Rivka Golani's switch from the violin to the viola in her last year in university marked the beginning of a long-term love affair with the instrument. She has been playing the viola for about 30 years and has committed herself entirely to it, she says.

"I love this instrument. I switched to the viola with a very clear mind and the decision to do the best one can on the instrument, and not accept the concept that the viola is secondary [to the violin]."

Golani says her innovations have contributed to the stylistic and technical advancement of the viola, and that over 200 pieces have been written for her, including 30 concertos.

"I was always interested in everything," she says. "So I covered everything all the time. I've researched old music and at the same time commissioned and worked with composers of today."

Golani is equally comfortable playing classical and contemporary pieces, and is not particular to a specific style.

"When I'm geared to do the contemporary, I'm fully there," she says. "And when I'm geared to do baroque, I'm fully there. And when I'm geared to do classical, I'm fully there...Once it comes to a performance situation, I just love it."

Passionately devoted to her craft, Golani is committed to perpetually advancing herself musically. She spends four to six hours a day practising her viola.

"You have to have a technique to be able to handle the instrument for so long without getting tired," she says.

Golani also teaches the viola. Her master classes are attended by students from around the world. However, she only teaches sporadically as she is usually travelling the world while on tour. She has performed almost everywhere, from North America to Europe to the Far East to Israel. Golani maintains strong links with Israel. She works with Israeli composers and performs there at least once a year.

Golani is also an accomplished painter. Her artwork has been showcased in exhibitions and she has sold some of her work. In the future, she would like to spend more time painting, but for the moment her focus is mostly on her music.

Rivka Golani

"I can't ride too many horses at the same time," she says. "As a profession, it [painting] is waiting. I cannot call myself a full-time painter."

She also plans to write music eventually. Although she has lots of ideas and has already started some preliminary work, she is elusive when asked about her music-writing.

"I don't talk about it until it's finished," she says. And if her accomplishments up until now are any indication, her completed pieces will be well worth the wait.

Rivka Golani performs with the TSO on June 13 at Roy Thomson Hall. She will then be on tour in Edmonton, Banff and Vancouver in mid-June.

Actress' visit to Belarus tugs at viewers' heartstrings

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Coming Home, Cayle Chernin's documentary about the importance and durability of family roots, tugs at the heartstrings.

The film, scheduled to be aired on Vision TV on June 16 at 9 p.m., takes Chernin – a Torontonian from Glace Bay, N.S. – on a sentimental journey to a town in Belarus, near Minsk, called Borisov.

There, in a joyful and magical reunion, she meets long-lost relatives, including Boris Chernin, the frail youngest brother of her late grandfather, Lable, who immigrated to Canada in 1911 and died in 1964.

The story of their poignant encounter is the subject of Coming Home, a one-hour film that also touches on the Holocaust and the present Jewish community of Borisov.

Put in touch with a Russian immigrant in New York City who turned out to be a second cousin, Chernin wrote to his family in Borisov, enclosing photographs of her great-grandparents.

Boris Chernin's son informed Chernin that they were related, and invited her to visit the clan. They were thrilled to discover that they had relatives abroad, Chernin reports.

In Borisov, she found out that Boris, a taciturn man capable of bursts of emotion, had been exiled to Siberia for 10 years after having been falsely accused of "counter-revolutionary" activities.

Chernin, as well, visits a bleak monument dedicated to the 9,000 Jews murdered by the Nazis, and the home of her great-grandparents.

In the course of events, she learns that the remaining Jews of Borisov – 1,000 in number as of 1992 – are returning to Judaism. In an emotionally warm scene, Chernin leads her relatives in Sabbath dinner prayers.

Coming Home tells us that Boris died a year after Chernin's visit, but unfortunately, it fails to bring the story right up to date. Are her relatives still living in Borisov? How are they faring? Have they emigrated? Has Borisov's Jewish community declined in the interval? These questions, left unsaid and unanswered, leave a gaping hole in the narrative.

Jewish variety showcase in danger of folding

By STACEY STEIN
Student Intern

The monthly variety show, Centre Spotlight, has showcased Yiddish and Jewish artists for over a year, but that may soon come to an end.

Gloria Valentine, founder of Centre Spotlight and artistic director of the non-profit Jewish Artists Scholarship Society (JASS), says the survival of the program depends upon its receiving a grant from the Toronto Arts Council.

Centre Spotlight's last show for the season is on June 20 at the Morris Winchevsky School. It will also be featured Aug. 26 at the CNE.

After that, "I don't know if we'll be able to open the doors again in September, if we don't get the grant," says Valentine.

Centre Spotlight "promotes our Jewish and Yiddish heritage; there's no place in the city where you can go and see something that is promoting both Yiddish and Jewish culture on a regular basis," she says.

Gloria Valentine

Since its inception in February 1997, Centre Spotlight has featured over 120 artists running the gamut from storytellers to dancers to Yiddish singers.

The artists only recently started receiving an honorarium for their work in the non-profit show. Proceeds from ticket sales go towards maintaining the performing space, such as the stage and sound system. Valentine says the artists enthusiastically take part because they are provided with a warm and nurturing atmosphere.

"They feel good performing here because everybody is portrayed in a good light, and they know they're given the respect that artists should receive."

Valentine's love for Yiddish and affinity for the arts inspired her to start Centre Spotlight.

"I've always wanted a place where Yiddish and Jewish artists could perform and be seen," says Valentine. "I believe in talent having an opportunity to be heard, I believe in Yiddish and I believe in my Jewish heritage. When people applaud, it makes me feel good."

Growing up with her grandparents, Valentine's first language was Yiddish. A professional actor and singer, she started performing in Yiddish in the late 1980s. Her personal involvement with the language and culture has driven her to promote Yiddish.

"Yiddish is 1,000 years old; it's the language spoken by our ancestors and it's the language that six million Jews spoke," she says.

She compares it to opera. "People of all ethnicities go to the opera, and they don't all understand Italian…but Yiddish is very moving, emotional and expressive; so they can enjoy it."

She notes that many Yiddish words have found their way into the North American lexicon, attesting to Yiddish's wide-ranging appeal. "Yiddish has crept into the English language. People of all denominations are using the words chutzpah and shmatte and schtick."

Although Centre Spotlight's main emphasis is on Yiddish and Jewish entertainment, the show also features non-Jewish performing artists. Valentine says that through Centre Spotlight "we've reached out to the community at large; we've built bridges in the community among other ethnicities."

She says that after each show, accolades pour in from the enthusiastic crowd. "At the end of each Centre Spotlight, people come up to me and say, 'This was the best one,'" she says. "They say that each time; so I feel we're doing something right."

Islands beckon

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

They're islands in the sun, beckoning Canadians from every walk of life.

Jamaica, from the Blue Mountains and Montego Bay to Dunn's River Falls and the Cockpit Country, is a perennial attraction for both sedentary and adventurous travellers. Jamaica (Raincoast Books, $24.95) explores this lush island in depth.

Despite its political isolation, Cuba is a popular destination, as Canadians can surely attest. Cuba (Raincoast, $21.95) roams the "Pearl of the Antilles," finding sun-kissed beaches, surprisingly modern resorts, picturesque colonial towns and unspoiled countryside.

The novelist Mark Twain called Hawaii "the loveliest fleet of islands that lies anchored in any ocean." Even if allowances are made for hyperbole, there is no doubt that the brilliant green Hawaiian islands are stunning in their beauty. Hawaii (Raincoast) explains why they are worth more than just a fleeing visit.

Caribbean cruises are beguiling, and after you've read Caribbean By Cruise Ship (Raincoast Books, $24.95) you'll probably agree. Anne Vipond's guide prepares you for a typical cruise and, better still, describes the major ports – from the Bahamas to San Juan – you can visit. An excellent reference book with splendid photographs.

Canuck fighter shocks Japanese martial arts fans

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Take your minds back to early September 1972.

Canada was at the pinnacle of the hockey world when a group of no-name Russian challengers waltzed into the Montreal Forum and beat the home side's all-stars in a game that rocked the country.

If you can recall the shock and bewilderment experienced by most Canadians that night, then you can begin to understand how thousands of Japanese "shooto" fans felt when an unknown Canadian marched into their own backyard and defeated the country's champion fair and square.

Three-time Canadian middleweight ju-jitsu titleist Joel Gerson, 23, was the man who pinned Japanese idol Rumina Sato in a match that lasted barely five minutes. Fighting in the shooto discipline – a variant of ju-jitsu – Gerson took advantage of an error by his Japanese opponent to apply an arm-lock submission hold and end the match in the first round.

Joel Gerson

A tape of the television broadcast shows the knowledgeable Japanese crowd of 2,000 reacting with a collective gasp when Gerson applied the hold, which puts tremendous pressure on the elbow joint. Sato held out for 22 seconds – most opponents can take the pain for only one or two – before "tapping out."

After the match, Gerson was mobbed by reporters eager to interview the man who had knocked Japan's shooto star off his pedestal. It was Sato's first loss by submission in five years.

For Gerson, the match was a vindication of his abilities as a fighter and a relief after weeks of nervous tension. When his coach, Moni Aizik of the Samurai Club, suggested he fight the Japanese champion, "I was unsure," Gerson said. His plate was already full studying for a bachelor's program in industrial relations at the University of Toronto, and his father was seriously ill. "What have we gotten ourselves into?" he asked at the time.

But Aizik was convinced Gerson had a shot at beating Sato if he prepared properly and employed the right strategy. While Sato was strong in all aspects of the sport – he can land deadly kicks and punches as well as grapple on the floor – Aizik felt Gerson would have his best chance if he got in close and grappled on the floor with his opponent.

Gerson trained three hours a day, six days a week, to get ready for the match. Aizik put him through the gruelling regimen he developed when training the Sayeret Matkal, Israel's elite commando unit, many years ago.

Gerson, who lost 12 pounds to get down to his fighting weight of 150, was physically and psychologically ready when he strode into the jam-packed Japanese auditorium to be offered up as a sacrificial lamb to the local hero.

He absorbed several painful kicks to the calfs from Sato as the fight unfolded, but his hours of "ducking drills" enabled him to avoid many of Sato's wicked punches. Part way through the first round of the three-round bout, Gerson got in close and brought Sato to the mat with a hip take down.

His strategy was working. "It makes no sense to stand there and exchange blows. Anybody can kick and punch. The art is the fight on the ground. That's the chess match," Gerson said.

Once he got Sato in the submission hold, with one of his legs across Sato's stomach, the other under his chin and pushing down hard, Gerson waited for his opponent to give up. He expected it to be a short wait, but because Sato is double jointed, he was able to withstand the pain longer than almost anyone else.

"In my mind, I thought, 'I can't let him get out or else we have to start over again," Gerson recalled. "And he'd be mad."

After what seemed like hours to Gerson, Sato gave up.

"I got up and I could see how happy my coach was. I was just happy it was over. It was an unbelievable feeling of relief because for 20 seconds, I didn't know what would happen."

Immediately, Gerson went from nondescript Canadian fighter to hero. The president of the shooto federation greeted him and gave him, Aizik and two other Canadian fighters use of a limousine and escorted them around Japan for sightseeing.

Gerson was mobbed by autograph seekers who wanted to know how he learned the techniques that enabled him to beat their champion.

While in Japan, their exalted status got the Canadians into a training session with legendary master Katsuhiko Kashiwazaki, a seventh degree black belt who teaches ju-jitsu at a fighting arts university.

Meanwhile, Gerson has agreed to return to Japan on Aug. 29 for a match against the country's third-ranked fighter. The winner of that fight will take on Sato for the country's championship.

Before that, Gerson will participate in the Canadian Open hosted by Aizik's Samurai Club. Sato is expected in Toronto for that event, and depending on the draw, he and Gerson could end up fighting each other again.

Gerson, who has a ready smile and a pleasant, almost gentle manner outside the ring, is already "strategizing for it. I can't sleep," he said.

The Inside Back

Coexistence in Inuvik

By BLAKE LAMBERT
Special to The CJN

INUVIK — As the fury and frenzy of celebrations surrounding Israel's fiftieth birthday have grabbed the world stage and then subsided, a much more subtle Canadian microcosm of the Middle East exists several thousand miles away.

Situated above the Arctic circle, the town of Inuvik declares itself the product of three separate but equal cultural pillars. It is home to Inuvialuit (western Arctic Inuit), Gwich'in (western Arctic Dene) and non-aboriginals, known as "unjit."

Created more than 40 years ago by the federal government, the town of Inuvik is about 10 years younger than Israel. Like Israel, before the federal government came along, there was no "self-governing" structure for Inuvik.

In fact, there was no town, just a settlement known as "East-3," some Ottawa bureaucrat's clever idea to name a new settlement.

However, Inuvialuit and Gwich'in lived in Inuvik and the Beaufort Delta region long before Ottawa even conceived of establishing a community north of the Arctic circle.

But when the government set up shop, the lives of Inuvialuit and Gwich'in started changing. Schools were built, giving their children and grandchildren a chance to get an education. Elders fondly reminisce about the arrival of schools. The government, because it employed people from the south, brought advancements like stores, roads and hospitals.

As Inuvik started to develop, some southerners who came here to work decided to make it their home. They were teachers and government workers who became part of the town. Their children grew up here and some of them have decided to stay and raise their families. Then there are southerners who didn't grow up in Inuvik, but have made a clear commitment to the north and this particular town.

All three groups clearly have a stake in the future of the town and the region, which has flagged over the years. The population of Inuvik shrunk when two of the major employers, the military and the oil companies, packed up and left town. Cutbacks by the territorial government to its civil service has also led to an exodus of people with well-paying jobs.

Despite having signed land claims, six and 14 years ago respectively, many Gwich'in and Inuvialuit beneficiaries are not thriving. Unjits dominate town council, the hospital and the RCMP. Many unjits in Inuvik have also accumulated substantial wealth. Yet much of the power and influence in the region rests with the chairs of the Gwich'in and Inuvialuit organizations, mostly with the latter.

If beneficiaries for either land claim have difficulties in town, they tend to lobby their chairs instead of the local MLA or town council. Unjits tend to lobby those politicians instead.

As self-government negotiations progress for both aboriginal groups, questions of who should govern who are beginning to emerge. Both Inuvialuit and Gwich'in want to wrest power from the territorial and federal governments to determine their destiny. That right was granted to them under their separate land claims.

But many non-aboriginals are wondering where this process will leave them. Some have claimed the current model of self-government will grant two votes to aboriginal people in elections, compared to one for non-aboriginals.

One person described this potential situation as "apartheid." But the chief negotiator for self-government, who's not aboriginal, has vehemently denied such a plan.

Dare to question an unjit why so many white people work for the aboriginal corporations and you wind up in a southern-style debate of employment equity. When an Asian man and Gwich'in man create a company called "Inuvialuit-Gwich'in Cultural Experience," they receive a cease and desist letter regarding the word "Inuvialuit" from the regional corporation.

Cultural appropriation, but only when appopriate, you could say.After all, reconciling the needs and wants of three distinct groups of people remains a complex task at best. And like Israel, there are no easy answers for Inuvik to solve its subtle, but fundamental conflict of cultural tension. I just hope for everyone's benefit that someone up here is actually working on some potential solutions.

About families

Dear Susan,

My 18-year-old son has confronted me with the fact that he is homosexual. He will not confide in his father for fear of reprisal. Despite his sexual orientation, he has chosen to abstain from sex altogether. How can I help him in his journey of self-discovery?

Dear Reader,

It is always difficult to confess one's homosexuality to one's parents. The fact that he has chosen to do so with you and not with his father puts you in a very difficult spot, because you inherit the emotional repercussions of that secret whether you keep it or not.

You indicate that he will not confide in his father for fear of reprisal. In your view, are his concerns well founded? Or is his anxiety about confiding in his father colored by his own lack of confidence and latent guilt?

Your son may consider joining a therapy group for gay teens. He could access such a group through a family service association or in the Jewish community itself. Individual therapy is an option for those who are less comfortable in groups.

In assessing how you can assist your son in coming to terms with his sexual orientation, you must carefully ask him, and yourself, a number of questions. How is your son coping academically and socially? Is he depressed? Does he feel supported by his peers? Is he alienated and alone? When did he decide to abstain from sex, and what has prompted that decision? These issues would be best explored in a neutral, non-judgmental therapeutic context.

You can mainly assist your son by providing him with the emotional support and stability he needs in this time when so much in his life is changing. Commend him for his courage in revealing the truth. Most of all, reassure him that he is still a much loved son and that you will always be available as a sounding board. Ensure that he knows that when the time is right for him, you will support him in disclosing his homosexuality to his father.

Susan Leventhal is a family, marital and individual therapist, who has been practising for more than 19 years.

Israel demands PA reciprocity prior to pullback proposal

By JAY BUSHINSKY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu is reportedly delaying his proposal for the next IDF redeployment in the West Bank until the middle of next month, to allow time for the Palestinian Authority (PA) to meet his preconditions.

According to the reports, he also wants to make sure the Clinton administration will be able to arrange a White House signing ceremony for the pullback agreement with PA Chairman Yasser Arafat.

The next three or four weeks are to be devoted to clarifying the terms and timetable of the prospective pullback agreement.

A senior government source said the crucial decision will be taken while the Knesset is still in summer session, which will last until the first week of August.

Similarly, the consensus among cabinet ministers polled was that mid-July was the probable date for the redeployment decision to be taken and its practical implications to become operational.

Military sources estimate that the IDF will require nearly three months to withdraw from its current positions and to form a new defensive line in conjunction with the upcoming redeployment plan.

Among the major international events likely to influence Netanyahu's timing is President Bill Clinton's trip to China this week and the ongoing crises – including the Serbian onslaught in Kosovo, the aftermath of the Indian and Pakistani nuclear tests and the economic instability in the Far East – which have been taking precedence over the State Department's concern about the Middle East.

Mid-July probable date

Netanyahu must also allow time for the PA to consider his oft-repeated terms for fulfilment of the Oslo accords' requirements insofar as IDF deployment is concerned, especially the demand that the Palestinian National Council reconvene to abrogate the Palestinian Covenant's anti-Israel clauses.

The "reciprocity" Netanyahu has said he expects in return for the evacuation of up to 15 percent of the West Bank and the concomitant handover of territory to the PA would include confiscation of unauthorized weapons in the possession of rank and file Palestinians, reduction of the Palestinian Police to the size specified in the Oslo accords, extradition of persons suspected of murder and a halt to anti-Israel incitement in the Palestinian media.

If the prime minister accedes to U.S. advice that he transfer at least 13.1 percent of the area in question without insisting on total Palestinian compliance with his demands, it is widely assumed his credibility as a negotiator in the subsequent rounds of U.S.-brokered talks with the PA will have been undermined.

Asked whether these considerations mean that the cabinet and Knesset decisions on redeployment are still several weeks away, a senior government official said, "The pullback may be more imminent than you think."

Swiss settlement opposed

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Toronto lawyer and his American associate are objecting to a proposed global settlement between the World Jewish Congress and three major Swiss banks.

The New York Times recently reported that the Union Bank of Switzerland, the Swiss Bank Corporation and Credit Suisse had offered a compensation package exceeding $1 billion (US) to end a multi-billion dollar lawsuit.

It was launched in New York City by Holocaust victims and their survivors over the recovery of dormant funds deposited in Swiss banks from 1933 to 1945, a tumultuous period which began with the rise to power of Adolf Hitler in Germany and concluded with the collapse of the Third Reich.

The offer, made in late May before the New York State Banking Department, appeared acceptable to the World Jewish Congress and an affiliate group, the World Jewish Restitution Organization.

TORONTO — Lawrence Hart, associate professor of medicine, McMaster University, has been acclaimed as the national president of B'nai Brith Canada (BBC). He is the first physician to be elected to that post.

Hart's community involvement includes serving as senior vice-president of BBC from 1996 to 1998, and as national chair of the Institute for International Affairs since 1995. He is currently on the board of directors for the Canada-Israel Committee.

Israelis Tops In Math

JERUSALEM — Israeli Grade 12 students top the world in mathematical ability, according to an international organization that researches student accomplishment. Israel shared the top spot with France, and was followed by Russia and then Switzerland.

Two Youths Killed

BEERSHEVA — Two youths were killed and one was injured when a roof collapsed in a school gymnasium. Rescuers worked for hours before extracting the bodies of the two students, Lior Caballo and Shlomo Toledo, from the rubble. According to witnesses, a group of students were playing basketball when the roof collapsed. Investigators are examining whether the collapse had any connection with renovations being done on the building.

Activists Detained

JERUSALEM — Police detained six foreign human rights activists during a demonstration against the expansion of Jewish settlement in eastern Jerusalem. The police forcibly dispersed the gathering after the demonstrators staged a sit-in near four homes that were occupied in the predominantly Arab neighborhood of Silwan.

Referendum Supported

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has indicated that he might support a nationwide referendum on a pending redeployment of troops from the West Bank. While saying he was not fully committed to a referendum, he told Israel Radio that "there must be broad public support" for the redeployment so that "rifts in the nation will heal."

Knesset Votes

JERUSALEM — The Knesset voted 38-10 in favor of a no-confidence measure against the Netanyahu government. Most coalition members, following the advice of the coalition chair, boycotted the vote, which requires a 61-vote majority to pass. It was the second time in as many weeks that the prime minister lost a no-confidence vote that had been boycotted by members of his governing coalition.

Peretz Re-elected

JERUSALEM — The chair of the Histadrut labor federation, Amir Peretz, won re-election by a landslide victory over opponent Maxim Levy. Observers said the ultimate strength of Histadrut, the umbrella organization for labor unions, will depend less on who won than on the outcome of government plans to privatize key industries that were once trade union strongholds.

CJC Donates Antique Hebrew Books

MONTREAL — Seven antique Hebrew texts dating from between 1732 and 1804 have recently been donated by Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) to the new Jewish Museum Franconia in Germany, located in the Bavarian city of Fuerth, where they were originally printed.

The books were among some 350 volumes that CJC received after World War II. In 1945, Dr. Shlomo Shuami of the Hebrew University was sent to Germany as the head of the Jewish Cultural Reconstruction Committee to investigate the warehousing by the Nazis of Jewish and Hebrew books and tracts.

In order to salvage and protect the books, some 40 percent were sent to North American institutions. CJC's volumes printed in Fuerth include commentaries on the biblical texts and on Jewish law. Some bear the three-leafed clover emblem of the city.

In an official thank you from the museum, director Bernhart Purin said the board and staff were "deeply impressed by the unexpected gift... The gesture impressed us because it is not self-evident that an important Jewish organization abroad donates such valuable books from its collection to a museum in Germany."

UJA Federation sets goal of $50 million

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — As the 21st century dawns, the UJA Federation has set a goal of raising $50 million in its annual campaign by the end of 2001.

The new goal means the campaign must raise another $13.5 million, said federation vice-chair Glennie Lindenberg. She expresssed confidence that Toronto donors will raise $50 million by 2001, considering the needs of local and world Jewry.

Although the community has grown by 40 percent in the past 10 years, the UJA Federation campaign total has not kept up with the growth in population, she said.

In the current year, the goal of $40 million will be reached by asking donors to return to their highest contribution, which reached a peak in 1989.

With the special three-year vision program ending this year, volunteer canvassers will have 8,000 new cards to cover, Lindenberg said.

A conviction that "the community will hold together again," despite strains posed by Israeli-Diaspora relations, was expressed by Joseph Steiner, re-elected as federation president.

Although the debate over the conversion issue in Israel impacted on the UJA campaign, the federation was able to raise $36.5 million, Steiner said.

It is evident that the community is united on main issues, said Steiner, as shown by the turnout of War criminals will be hunted, South African judge vows

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — It is too late for real justice to be served in the apprehension of Nazi war criminals, says Justice Richard Goldstone of the Constitutional Court of South Africa.

"But the reason I support never stopping, is that all war criminals should know that they will never be let alone; they must know that they will be hunted for the rest of their lives."

Goldstone, president of World ORT Union (WOU) was here for administrative meetings with international delegates of WOU. He met with members of ORT Canada and spoke to the American Psychiatric Association convention.

Goldstone chaired the Commission of Inquiry Regarding Violence and Intimidation in South Africa from 1991 to 1994, which brought him international recognition as an advocate for human rights, and led to his appointment in 1994 as chief prosecutor of the UN's International Criminal Tribunals for the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda.

He was recently invited by President Carlos Menem of Argentina to become a member of the Commission for clarification of Nazi activities in the Argentine Republic.

Goldstone said that he does not believe in collective guilt. "Crimes are committed by criminals. In Germany, without criminal leaders it wouldn't happen – the fact that people follow is a human response in any country – that's the difference between good leaders and evil leaders."

Justice Richard Goldstone

He stressed the importance of South Africa's Commission of Inquiry, which became known as the Goldstone Commission. It created an atmosphere in which negotiators could negotiate, and where the commission could quickly investigate specific incidents. Sensible early intervention, he says, can help.

He added that if there were evil leaders in South Africa "we would have had a blood bath. They avoided a blood bath by adopting policies of peace and reconciliation, and most South Africans have accepted it.

"I have no doubts that [with regards to] any human rights abuses, the sooner they investigate them and the truth made public, the less prospect that there will be a build up – it is important to nip that sort of thing in the bud."

Goldstone will be attending an international diplomatic conference in Rome later this month initiated by the United Nations. More than 100 countries, represented by high level government officials, will try to settle the terms of an international treaty to establish a permanent international criminal court which will have jurisdiction to investigate and put war criminals on trial.

Goldstone says he is a strong advocate for an international criminal justice court. "Otherwise it is going to get worse, because modern technology is making it easier for evil people to do evil things."

Goldstone said that the United States is taking "a very unfortunate attitude whereby they want this court to be beholden to the Security Council which will mean it won't be independent."

He is opposed, and says that he is happy that the Canadian and South African governments and 45 other governments want the court to be an independent judicial body that should be driven by judicial considerations.

Goldsone, active in ORT for more than 32 years, says that ORT's role is becoming more and more relevant because the world depends on technology, and ORT trains people, particularly in developing countries, in technology.

Goldstone says that he became involved with ORT because "It is an organization that makes a huge difference to individuals, and the idea that appealed to me is that it doesn't give charity. It enables individuals to become free of charity. ORT's goal is to help them become self-sufficient."

He noted that ORT has formed an international commission to look at its role in the 21st century.

A new board of directors for Toronto ORT was recently appointed. Gordon Berger of Panfinancial is the newly elected president.

Landy takes over CJC Ont. region

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Keith Landy, 47, is the new chair of the Ontario region, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC).

Landy, who came to Canada from South Africa in 1970, told The CJN he does not feel like a newcomer, considering the multicultural nature of Canada. He describes Toronto as the most vibrant Jewish city in the world, outside Israel.

He thinks the issue of financial aid to Jewish day schools deserves priority on his agenda. He says that when the Supreme Court of Canada decided to opt out in its recent decision on this matter, it put the ball in the Ontario government's court and that's where pressure needs to be applied.

Landy has already asked the Ontario minister of education for an appointment to discuss the matter.

He is excited at the prospect of serving his three-year mandate for the Jewish people of Ontario.

Also high on his agenda is a determination to move the Ontario region to a proactive, rather than a reactive, mode. Among the social issues he champions are affordable housing and safeguarding of health services for ethnic communities, particularly in view of recent funding cutbacks.

"On these matters, we as Jews have a special responsibility to help the disadvantaged."

The increases in university tuitions are a cause of concern, he says, because many Jews who can't afford these hikes will not attend, while others will have a huge debt when they graduate. "I'm going to continue to point out that higher education is not a privilege, it's the future."

Keith Landy

He is concerned about the lack of unity in the community, and thinks some headway can be made if Congress provides a forum for debate on the issues.

Support for Israel is an important plank in his program, especially in encouraging young people to visit Israel. He would also like to see the federation expand its young leadership development program. He is one of its graduates.

Born in Coventry, England, Landy moved with his family to South Africa when he was three years old. The Landys lived in several small communities there for 13 years, and for three years in Harare, Zimbabwe (formerly Salisbury in Rhodesia).

He was a yeshivah student for two years in Johannesburg and was active in that city in Zionist youth groups with different viewpoints, Habonim, Betar and B'nai Akiva. "I learned something from each of them," he said.

The Landys came to Canada in 1970 and at age 19, Keith enrolled at McMaster University in political science. Later he transferred to the University of Windsor, obtaining his law degree in 1975. He was called to the bar in 1977, the same year he married

Landy is the son of the late Rabbi David Landy, who was the first rabbi of Beth Radom Congregation in Toronto. His mother, Joan, 68, lives in Toronto, as do his sister Cheryl and brother, Ian.

He is a member of Shaar Shalom Synagogue in Thornhill.

He rose to national prominence as counsel for CJC at the Somalia inquiry in Ottawa, and in the Canadian Human Rights Commission vs. Malcolm Ross and the New Brunswick Teachers Federation at the Supreme Court of Canada.

He is a partner in Landy, Marr & Associates, which specializes in civil litigation.

5,000 people for the celebration of Israel's 50th anniversary, when only 1,500 were expected.

A turnout of an estimated 15,000 for the walk for Israel was another good sign.

The federation will continue to seek advice from its denominational advisory committee on the unity issue. "They have met several times and recognize the interests we have in common. The events of the past few weeks indicate we need their assistance."

The opening of a York Region office by the federation is an effort to serve the 40,000 Jews in Thornhill who make up the third-largest Jewish community in Canada.

JIAS Toronto mandate expanded

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The busiest office of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services of Canada (JIAS) is about to get busier.

New directions for JIAS Toronto include expanding the agency's mandate for helping new arrivals to five years, from two years.

Excluded will be financial aid, which will stay at two years.

But JIAS Toronto will extend everything else – job training and placement, language instruction and other settlement and integration services – for an additional three years.

The new direction's goal is to shift away from simply helping new arrivals find jobs and housing, and encourage them to put down roots.

The idea is "integration, not just immigration," new JIAS Toronto regional council chair Guidy Mamann said at the agency's recent annual meeting.

Mamann, an immigration lawyer and himself an immigrant from Morocco, said an extended five-year mandate is more appropriate "not just to see that [immigrants] are settled, but to see that they are among us, and active in every way."

JIAS Toronto also wants to put more emphasis on skills training and job placement. One goal is the creation of a Jewish job bank, to be posted on the Internet, Mamann said.

Mamann takes over from Sandra Atlin, who headed the agency for two years. And it was the first annual meeting for new executive director Sharon Zeiler, who took over from Perry Romberg earlier this year.

Zeiler reported that over the past year, JIAS Toronto's caseload increased by eight percent over the year before. The agency aided 650 immigrant families, or about 1,600 individuals.

As in previous years, the bulk (60 percent) of new Jewish arrivals to Toronto came from Russia, with the rest from Ukraine, Belarus and the Baltic states.

Almost a year ago, the national office of JIAS invited children and teens to submit art on the theme, Life as a Jewish Immigrant in Canada. Over 100 young people responded, most of whom immigrated here from Bosnia, Russia and Ukraine.

The contest winners were announced at the JIAS Toronto annual meeting. They were Jessica Lusthouse, age 5, of Richmond Hill; Anna Hodgins together with Alina Rokhman, both 8, of Calgary, tied with Barak Zvulonof, age 11, of Thornhill; and Anna Gindin, age 12, and Dmitry Bondarenko, age 15, both of Toronto, tied.

JWF microcosm of community, says new president Langer

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Janice Langer

TORONTO — Jewish Women's Federation (JWF) is a microcosm of what the Jewish community should be, believes Janice Langer.

"We all can get together despite our religious and political affiliations and work for the common good of the community," said the new president of JWF, a department of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the umbrella for 49 local Jewish women's organizations. "Our programming reflects things that go across socio-economic, cultural and religious lines."

A recent JWF project was the creation of a symbolic quilt in honor of Israel's 50th anniversary and in protest against domestic violence. The project served to bring together JWF affiliates and to highlight community interests, noted Langer.

JWF plans for the coming year include co-sponsoring a November lecture by Rabbi Abraham Twersky on domestic abuse (with Jewish Book Fair and Jewish Family & Child Service); organizing a party in early July for newcomers to Toronto through Shalom Toronto (which is a joint project with UJA Women's Campaign); and running an educational series on financial issues for both personal money management and community leadership.

"In my generation," said the 52-year-old Langer, "a lot of women have stayed away from certain positions because there's a financial aspect involved. Women represent almost half the population. We're an important force. We need to become more proactive and more involved in leadership."

When she got her start in community work as a UJA volunteer almost 25 years ago, Langer didn't know how to read a budget. "If you look at it long enough, you figure it out," she said, adding that it would have been helpful to have someone teach her.

A former president of Associated Hebrew School's parents' association, Langer has also been involved with the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto. She is a board member and past executive member of Jewish Family & Child Service, and became involved with JWF about six years ago.

"My heart is still in fundraising, but you also want to have some say in how the funds are being used," she said. "We live in a wonderful Jewish community, and you want it to stay strong."

JWF will be sending a survey to board members this summer to examine women's involvement in volunteer leadership positions. "Why are there not that many women heading agencies and departments?" Langer asked.

Langer hopes the project, initiated by her predecessor Jill Reitman, will enable organizations to understand and act on the reasons women may have for not filling positions.

Although it is often difficult for working women to attend daytime meetings, Langer – who works part-time – reported significantly higher attendance at at least one daytime event than at its evening equivalent.

She herself has had difficulty being on time for 6:30 meetings. "Even now when my kids are grown, I always feel I have to come home and make supper [and] that's not anything to be minimized. Supper is often the only time families get together."

The mother of a son and two daughters in their twenties, and grandmother of a 21-month-old girl, Langer cautioned her children in her installation speech not to let her new position stop them from making her a mother-in-law or a grandmother again. "I'll find the time," she said. "That is, after all, what Jewish continuity is all about."

Distress Line hires staffer

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — For the first time in its 13-year history, Tel-Aide Jewish Distress Line has hired a part-time, salaried staff person.

Bonnie Kates, chair of the distress line says that until now, Tel-Aide has been "100 percent volunteer-run, but due to the generosity of a benefactor, we have been able to hire an office administrator."

Esther Lahamy, who was trained at another distress line, now works about 10 hours a week in space donated by B'nai Brith Canada (BBC), says Kates. "Volunteers have been responsible for such things as correspondence and volunteer staffing. Having someone to do this work frees up the board of directors to run the distress line."

Prospective volunteers, she says, must be good listeners. "Before they are hired, they are interviewed by two experienced volunteers and then invited to attend a six-week program that involves being trained on the phones and learning about various resources in the Jewish community and beyond. Ten percent of our callers are non-Jews."

She says that although they do get suicidal callers, "not all calls are crisis calls. Sometimes people just need a shoulder to lean on or need help to formulate a plan. We can make referrals, suggest counselling, help people make a move to a shelter; our staff is trained to deal with everything."

Kates says she became a Tel-Aide volunteer after her mother died and she felt she needed a change in her life. "I saw an ad that said Tel-Aide was seeking volunteers. I called and I haven't looked back since. It was part of my healing process to move on. I honestly receive more from Tel-Aide than what I put in."

Tel-Aide, which is "strongly supported by B'nai Brith Canada, the Stelero Foundation and now by this recent benefactor," has begun talks with BBC's Forestdale Heights Lodge to jointly run an auction, with proceeds going to the distress line, Kates says.

A Tel-Aide volunteer is always available to speak to community groups. "We are constantly networking in order to get word out about our work and to find new volunteers. There are many people who do not know about our services and many more who are ashamed to call. They need to know that all callers are anonymous. There is no caller ID; so we do not know who is on the phone."

We acknowledge with gratitude the warmth, kindness and generosity of our friends and relatives on the passing of our dearly beloved and sorely missed

El Al plans improved service

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Joel Feldschuh

TORONTO — El Al Israel Airlines is currently implementing a strategic plan intended to improve its onboard service and make the air carrier more competitive internationally, the airline's president proclaimed last week during a visit to Toronto.

In 1997, El Al's board of directors decided on a strategic plan whose goal is to "change the perception of El Al," said Joel Feldschuh, who was in Toronto last week after attending a meeting in Montreal of IATA, the airline industry's regulatory agency.

The changes will allow the airline to compete with foreign carriers who increasingly are eyeing the Israeli market, said Feldschuh, who was accompanied by Michael Gat, El Al's vice-president of commercial and industrial affairs.

While in Toronto, Feldschuh, Gat and Moshe Shamai, El Al's Canadian general manager, hosted a reception for the airline's clients, travel agents and representatives of the Jewish community.

Feldschuh said the change in El Al's corporate culture came one year after it posted "heavy" losses of $83 million (US), in part due to a traffic dropoff in 1996 caused by increased terrorist attacks, but also due to increased competition from other carriers. By 1997, the losses were reduced to $4 million.

The airline's poor financial showing led the board to conclude the time was ripe for broad changes in all aspects of the carrier's operations, including a change in management, Feldschuh said.

Many of the changes were designed to improve El Al's "image" that it is not service oriented. About one year ago, El Al initiated an intensive training program for its employees "to reframe their way of thinking and focus more on service ... We have to enhance our product and make our people more [conscious of service]," he said.

The airline has also embarked on an ambitious program of replacing its fleet of aging aircraft, decommissioning older jumbo jets and replacing them with new Boeing 747-400s, 767s and other aircraft. The airline expects a turnover of 15 aircraft in 1999, he added.

The new 747s will provide all passengers, including those in economy, with a personal television monitor located in the seat in front of them, as well as more space between seats.

El Al is also increasing "the pitch" (space) between seats in its fleet of 767s, Feldschuh continued. "Ten days ago, we enlarged dramatically the pitch between the seats in business class," adding 12 centimetres. A byproduct of that adjustment is to create more space in the economy cabin, he added.

The airline has taken other steps to improve convenience for its Canadian passengers. Last September, El Al moved to Montreal's Dorval Airport from the more isolated Mirabel facility, and in Toronto, the airline switched from Terminal 2 to Terminal 3, "improving our service."

El Al flies out of Toronto four times a week, via either Montreal or New York, while two other flights originate weekly from Montreal. Feldschuh said the airline is planning to introduce 767-ERs (extended range) aircraft to the Toronto route next year "which should enable us to introduce non-stop service from Toronto to Tel Aviv."

El Al is dominating the U.S. market, flying jumbo jets 26 times a week to Israel, but in Canada, it's quite a different story, the El Al executives acknowledged. The airline is experiencing tremendous competition from Air Canada, which has initiated non-stop flights from Toronto to Tel Aviv, they said.

El Al still ferries approximately 37,000 Canadians to Israel each year, but that number has not improved in 1998. Feldschuh and Gat argue that an agreement signed 25 years ago by Canada and Israel creates an unfair advantage for Air Canada. Negotiators met in Israel last week to discuss the agreement, though changes are still a long way off, Gat said.

More than half the traffic Air Canada is carrying to Israel originates in the United States, in effect subsidizing the smaller Canadian market. That situation that was not contemplated in the agreement, Gat said.

Israel has been hamstrung by the agreement, he added. For years when El Al was the only carrier serving Canada, "Canadian authorities put restrictions on our activities." El Al was forced to fly as often from Montreal as from Toronto, even though the Toronto market was larger, he said.

El Al is still not permitted under terms of the agreement – though Ottawa seems to be turning a blind eye to the practice – to feed its Montreal traffic to Israel through the United States. However, Air Canada is doing something similar with its passengers originating in the United States, Gat said.

Now, the next step

The legislature of Nova Scotia endorsed the Calgary declaration last week. It was the last provincial assembly to do so, setting in motion the next stage of the nation-wide process aimed at the people of Quebec, to clarify, and possibly remediate, our opaque sense of national unity.

In the near future, however, we may experience a number of interruptions in that process. And we had better brace ourselves.

There has been some speculation in the press that the Supreme Court might soon hand down its decision on Quebec's right to unilaterally secede. Whatever the decision by the court, the separatist government in Quebec will respond vehemently. It will seize upon the decision as a pretext for its outrage.

A provincial election will follow in short course, and with it inevitably will come the next referendum. Indeed, even without a decision from the Supreme Court, an election is expected in Quebec in the autumn. With Lucien Bouchard leading the separatists, we know we will hear inflaming and inflammatory rhetoric.

In the heat, rhetoric and exigencies of Quebec's election campaign, the transition to the next phase of the remediating process may be lost. We must guard against this possibility. For as the premiers of the ratifying legislatures have stated, the Calgary declaration is but a beginning in the effort to secure the country's united future.

We would expect, therefore, that federalist leaders throughout the country will remind the people of Quebec, even in the midst of an election there, that the process is underway and that they are determined to do everything possible to achieve a meaningful, invigorated new national unity.

Threatened by all sides

Israel's democracy is like all other democracies: difficult, demanding, testing, infuriating and exhilarating. Only more so. Decisions of state must always be balanced against decisions of coalition maintenance. Otherwise, like an insecure Humpty Dumpty, the government would fall with each forceful breeze of political pressure. And in Israel, as we know, every new day seems to bring countless new political breezes. Most of the time, however, the needs of state and the needs of coalition can be reconciled. But when they cannot, broad, national interest must always supercede narrow, party interest.

As a political breeze, the issue of the second redeployment by the IDF from the West Bank is a veritable gale force. The matter has been under negotiation for some 18 months, most recently in an unusually public and caustic manner between the United States and Israel.

The media is rife with reports that Israel's Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu is being threatened by all sides of his coalition. His government will fall if he either does or does not proceed with the next troop withdrawal.

The Third Way, a vital coalition party member from whose ranks Avigdor Kahalani was appointed internal security minister, has vowed to leave the government if an appropriate troop withdrawal has not been announced by July 15.

On the other side, former chief Ashkenazi rabbi Avraham Shapiro has issued a psak Halachah, a legal directive, to Knesset members and ministers of the National Religious Party to bring down the coalition if the cabinet decides on a second withdrawal of 13 percent. Adding his voice to the discord, was Agriculture Minister Raphael Eitan suggesting that new elections be held immediately.

If, in the present situation, the needs of state cannot be reconciled with the needs of coalition, we urge the prime minister to ignore party clamoring and choose the middle way, the way of the national interest.

Levine can't benefit from federalism and separation

Your editorial in which you quote from the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms (CJN, May 28), has created a two-edged sword.

David Levine is a separatist and his mandate is to destroy the very living fibres of the country in which he lives, or as you so eloquently state: "intent on Canada's dismemberment."

Canada's Charter of Rights does provide, as you so succinctly point out, fundamental freedoms for its citizens. However, common sense dictates that there are limits to this freedom, or there should be. Why, I might ask, should the Canadian Charter apply to someone who doesn't believe in or have faith in these rights? In some democratic countries, including the United States and Israel, any individual who supports a cause that is meant to harm in any way, or to endanger the existence of that country's safety, is deemed to be a traitor. Only in Canada are these individuals elevated to prominent positions. Only in Canada, can a separatist party become the official opposition party.

It seems that Levine likes to maintain his separatist ties, but at the same time enjoy the fruits of our federalist labors. His salary is paid for by taxpayers' dollars, subsidized by federalist coffers. It is my belief that he should have the choice of benefiting from federalism or separatism, but not both.

Levine's qualifications as administrator may be impeccable, but for you to suggest that he will not use his position to advance his political loyalties is akin to suggesting that you as an editor will formulate and make decisions by putting aside the fact that you are a Jew and a federalist. In both instances, this is impossible.

Other issues loom large in Levine appointment

The CJN has a special responsibility to the Jewish community to know the facts that led to the outcry against the appointment of David Levine as Ottawa Hospital CEO.

The issue is not his private beliefs but his current public role as the Parti Québécois (PQ) government's chief international propagandist in New York. This is the government whose leader blamed a referendum defeat on "ethnics and money" and whose (language) police seized matzah boxes on the eve of Pesach using unilingualism as the pretext. This government's police are now harassing retailers whose livelihood depends on Hebrew signage.

The CJN should be concerned that Levine has done nothing to distance himself from the odious discriminatory practices of the government that built his career.

The CJN misrepresents the Charter in defending Levine's appointment. In practice, all senior appointments are politically vetted. This is why Levine's federalist predecessor in New York was sacked, why Levine got the job, and why Ottawa hospitals don't have to accept him.

Levine's opponents are not driven by "mob rage and anger." Both Ottawa newspapers oppose Levine because he has lost the public's confidence through his association with a government that continues to violate the Charter. Physicians worry that the PQ government contravenes the law daily by underreimbursing Ottawa hospitals, which Quebecers use liberally. The PQ's financial chicanery weakens Ottawa hospitals and damages the portability clause of the Canada Health Act.

Indeed, the opposition to Levine comes from people who are deeply concerned about the fundamental freedoms of Canada's Charter of Rights.

Israel victim of double standard

Gerald Steinberg in his article, "An Incitement To Violence" (CJN, May 28), reports that on May 14, the Palestinians marked al-nakba, the catastrophe resulting from Israel's creation in 1948. Perhaps if Palestinians had accepted the United Nations resolution to partition Palestine in 1948, they could now be looking back on 50 years of prosperity rather than four wars that resulted in death and destruction and ongoing frustration and poverty.

Notwithstanding that the plight of the Palestinians is by and large due to the shortsightedness of their leaders and the leaders of the rest of the Arab world, critics of Israel continue to paint Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu as an obstructionist and as the cause for the failure of the peace process being brought to a satisfactory solution.

Why is there not a resolution in the United Nations or an unqualified statement by President Bill Clinton and the European Union pressing the Palestinian Parliament to once and for all rescind the odious covenant calling for the destruction of Israel? Can one imagine a country being admitted to the European Union if it had in its constitution a pledge to annihilate a fellow member?

Additionally, it is ludicrous for the United States to suggest that Israel is quibbling about surrendering four percent more of the West Bank when it is blessed with vast territories and is in no danger whatever from its hostile neighbors. There is indeed a lot of frustration with regard to the slow moving peace process, but to me the overriding frustration is the lack of fairness and balance in identifying the real culprits.

Yiddish in Canada: an update

By LEO DAVIDS

The history of Yiddish in Canada continues to evolve, and one can keep up to date on this by examining the new information found in the 1996 Canadian census.

In that census, detailed language counts were given again, following up on the same questions posed in the 1991 census: questions on what languages people are able to speak, what language is generally used in the home, as well as the classic question used since the beginning of the century on what is the mother tongue of those responding.

In this essay, we are going to look at the Yiddish responses in the 1996 census, comparing them with what we saw in earlier censuses, as well as with the number of Hebrew speakers in Canada.

If we go back historically to the years before World War II, we know that Yiddish was the usual language of Jews at home and at work, as well as in synagogues and other places where Jews congregated. Up till about 1950, a majority of all Jews in Canada were raised with Yiddish as their mother tongue, their first childhood language. However, after 1951, the numbers show a decline in Yiddish, as English was increasingly being used in all areas of life, including as the language heard by small children at home.

The 1951 census has a Yiddish mother tongue population of just over half the total number of Jews (by religion) in the country; however, in later years, the population reporting Yiddish as a mother tongue became a smaller and smaller fraction of the population reporting Judaism as their faith.

Before 1976, Statistics Canada did not count Hebrew speakers at all. Anyone who wrote that Hebrew was their mother tongue or the language used in the home would have been thrown into the "Yiddish" category. In 1976, Hebrew was included under the heading "Semitic languages." Thus, we can only compare Yiddish and Hebrew speaker populations in this country from 1981 on.

Let us note that Yiddish was much more commonly used in Canada than Hebrew during the 1980s, but that has changed. Based on the language questions identified earlier, the census shows us that ability to speak Hebrew is now more widespread in Canada than ability to speak Yiddish, although there are still enough older Yiddish speakers to make the Yiddish mother tongue population larger than the Hebrew language population. Obviously, Hebrew is a "younger" language; not many Canadian Jewish seniors speak it.

The idea of "projecting into the future" is based on a quite simple thought: Any language whose speakers are elderly, let us say age 60 and up, has a very limited future. On the other hand, wherever we find a significant number of children who speak a language, we can assume that that language will continue to appear on our cultural scene for some decades to come. That is why the table below looks particularly at the child population (ages 0-14 years) as compared with the seniors population, where we expect to find quite a few people who are still able to speak Yiddish and who in fact do use it as their home language.

If we look at the answers to the question on ability to converse in Yiddish, the total for all of Canada is almost 47,000 people. However, it is important to note that only eight percent of those people are children under age 15, as compared with 60 percent age 60 and up.

When we review ability to speak Yiddish in Toronto and Montreal, we see a very large contrast. In the Greater Toronto Area, children make up only four percent of all those who are able to speak Yiddish; whereas 15 percent of all those in greater Montreal who can converse in that language are children. This means that there are approximately four times as many young Yiddish speakers in Montreal as there are in Toronto, despite the fact that there were many more Jews in Toronto than in Montreal in 1996. This is partly because the Sephardi population does not generally know Yiddish.

When we look at Yiddish as a home language, which is how most children learn to speak it, the picture is very similar. There are 6,700 Canadians who reported that, as of 1996, their usual tongue at home was Yiddish. Of those, 45 percent were seniors, while 31 percent were children under 15. However, the Toronto versus Montreal comparison gives us results similar to what we saw with regard to ability to speak.

In Toronto, only nine percent of all the people who reported Yiddish as their home language were children under the age of 15, compared with 84 percent who are 60 years old and over. Clearly, Yiddish is a home language in the Greater Toronto Area mostly for seniors, with a very small child population learning Yiddish at home. Secular "Yiddishism" has faded away. In Toronto, Hebrew is "big" – there are over 30,000 people able to speak Hebrew here.

However, Yiddish has some real life in Montreal, in that children are learning the language at home and will therefore be carrying it forward into the next century. Looking at the Montreal figures, we see that 4,750 people in the greater Montreal area report Yiddish as their major language at home. Thirty-nine percent of that number are children under the age of 15, whereas seniors make up only 29 percent of those reporting Yiddish as the home language. Here, it is obvious that the child speakers substantially outnumber the seniors, in terms of Yiddish home language population.

How do we explain these vast differences between Toronto and Montreal? Why is it just Montreal that has a significant population of children who have learned Yiddish by hearing it at home (and at school)? The answer is that greater Montreal has some significant and strong ultra-Orthodox "pockets" of population, where Yiddish is the predominant language in Jewish circles, and English and French are essentially kept out by non-use of public schools, television and other vehicles by which the larger culture is brought into people's homes. Chassidic children hear Yiddish, not just at home, but in the cheder, yeshivah and beit midrash (adult study hall) too.

A recent study of the chassidic population of Outremont and vicinity found that Yiddish is the mother tongue of most of the ultra-Orthodox people in that part of Montreal, and most of the younger respondents to their survey reported that they were fluent in Yiddish. Since this data is only a year or two old, it is obvious that this is where and how Yiddish continues to live in Canada today.

Other than the ultra-Orthodox population in tightly concentrated neighborhoods where Yiddish can be maintained, and among Jews who are now in their 70s and 80s, the language has been given up. There is some interest and activity at an academic level, but that is not what we generally see as authentic language survival.

The chassidic strategy of being separate in dress, language and other things has kept Yiddish going in their own "distinct society," and no doubt they will keep on faithfully speaking the mameloshen as long as there are chassidic neighborhoods in Canada.

This famous photograph by Roman Vishniac from his collection A Vanished World evokes a mainly Yiddish-language way of life for youngsters that the author writes can still be found in certain "pockets" of the Jewish population in Montreal.

Opinions

A free or biased press?

By Shira Herzog in Toronto

What started out as a legitimate debate over the future of public broadcasting in Israel quickly became a politicized debate on bias in Israel Television's Channel One, its public arm. After all, this is Israel. The long-simmering issue came to a head several weeks ago, with the disciplinary action taken by the newly appointed chair of the Israel Broadcasting Authority (IBA), Uri Porat, against two news editors whom he accused of "biased editing".

The IBA, much like the CBC and TVO, has been the subject of intense scrutiny and discussion in an era of privatization and a proliferation of private cable channels. The stiff competition from the private licensees of a second channel that was approved just a few years ago, as well as several specialty channels, has raised questions about the merits of public broadcasting. When Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and his feisty communications minister, Limor Livnat, made it clear that their privatization plans might include the IBA, the battle lines were drawn.

In the early stages, the discussion remained within professional parameters. Supporters of public broadcasting argued that only freedom from the ratings war and the profit motive could provide an appropriate framework for high-quality, original production, appropriate representation of different viewpoints, and protection from the "lowest common denominator" approach of commercial television. Sounds familiar.

But the real, underlying issue quickly emerged. Netanyahu and several of his cabinet ministers complained repeatedly of bias in the IBA, and accused its senior and rank-and-file journalists of favoring the "left" in their coverage. Netanyahu included the media in his attack on the old "elites" whom he wished to challenge and, in fact, unseat. His choice of chair, Uri Porat, who had served an earlier term in the position in the early '80s, was seen as a statement of intent, and by some, as a declaration of war. Porat lost no time in demonstrating his new, tough approach. The issue was a recent news report on the victory celebrations by Beitar Jerusalem on winning the National Cup in soccer. According to the broadcast report, Netanyahu was present while shouts of "Death to the Arabs" were heard in the ecstatic crowd. Netanyahu's condemnation of the cries, and a statement denying he had heard them, were broadcast in the report, but for Porat, this was not good enough. He seized the opportunity to chastise the editors and to publicly demand their suspension. His action was welcomed by Knesset members on the right, who have long criticized the "left-wing" media and its conspiracy against the current government.

The incident itself was obviously blown out of proportion, but this is precisely the point. Since Yitzhak Rabin's assassination, the media are over-sensitive to Netanyahu's presence when an aroused crowd loses control. In this particular case, Netanyahu probably did not hear the cries, and had he heard them, he would have demanded that they stop. There was room for a debate on the newsworthiness of the item, but it need not have taken on the exaggerated proportions that it did for Porat. As for the journalists at the IBA, they reacted as much to the "chilling effect" of this episode and to their perception of Porat as a political appointee with a clear agenda.

To the objective eye, the entire story seems like a throwback to the earlier days of what was, indeed, a state-controlled broadcaster. When there was only one, publicly funded, television channel, and in the days when the media deferred to the government's definition of the state's security interest, there might indeed have been a bias in favor of the government's perspective. All of that changed in 1973. Israeli journalists blamed themselves for "buying into" the intelligence establishment's assessment of the Egyptian and Syrian movements. This assessment, in turn, led to what became known as "the failure," and the devastating surprise attack on Yom Kippur. Since then, the Israeli media have become much tougher in their investigative approach. Indeed, in coverage of security matters, some observers describe the media's transition from "collusion" to "collision" with the establishment.

The more interesting aspect of the "Beitar item" is its role in the context of Netanyahu's challenge to the so-called old elites. In some ways, the challenge to the sense of entitlement in pockets of the old elite is a welcome one. But it is a risky game when objectivity and fairness in the media are defined as unquestioning advocacy of a particular position. Israel's journalists have proven themselves as being tough on whoever is in power, and no government has ever felt that it is fairly treated. This most recent episode should lead to an honest debate on the media and its role, rather to an entrenchment in existing positions.

Israel, realpolitik and the bomb

By Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

The world has been jolted by the underground nuclear tests of India and Pakistan. Both countries, for sound political as well as geostrategic reasons of their own, felt the need to disregard world public opinion and do what they felt they had to do. India's initial testing in this round was due more to fears of long-term Chinese intentions than Pakistani intervention in Kashmir. As of this writing, it is not clear if this episode of testing is finished. There is a chance that one or both of the countries will be testing missile systems capable of delivering nuclear warheads as well.

Remember the old joke about the elephants, the Jews and the start of World War I? (Why the elephants? Why the Jews?) Well it did not take long for a Jewish/Israeli angle to emerge on this issue. Published newspaper accounts have made reference to alleged Israeli cooperation with the Indian nuclear effort, up to the possible Israeli origin of two of the five Indian nuclear devices tested. I have no idea about the accuracy of these stories. Not surprisingly, many Islamic states are delighted with the Pakistani tests, speaking of an "Islamic bomb" that could neutralize the advantage held by Israel in the region.

The backdrop for these allegations is the fact that India's new governing party is dedicated to a vision of aggressive Hindu nationalism that is directly and indirectly anti-Islamic. During the last electoral campaign, the party was up front about its intention of going ahead with nuclear testing as well as its commitment to retaining Kashmir.

All this is part of the power chess game being played out in Asia, and is rooted in the potential confrontation between India and China. China is alleged to be supportive of Pakistan's nuclear program, and Russia is assumed to be supporting India.

Against such superpowers, Israel would appear as a minor league player. Ideally, Israel would like to improve relations with both India and China, and she has. Yet the basic fact is that no one should dismiss out of hand the possibility of some Israeli links to India's nuclear program. One of the primal rules of international realpolitik is: "The enemy of my enemy is my friend." This rule works for both India and Israel. India's relations with Israel over the past decades have not been the warmest. But clearly there are possibilities for rapprochement with the new Indian government that did not exist before.

The sad fact is that Israel cannot afford to be a neutral or passive observer as the nuclear scene unfolds on the Asian subcontinent. An Islamic bomb originating in Pakistan might well find its way to Iran and Iraq, as well as to rogue states like Libya. Right now, Pakistan's focus seems to be on support for insurgency in Kashmir rather than on challenging Israel on her security needs. But that could change.

Years ago, Israel faced international censure when she acted alone and bombed the Iraqi nuclear facility. Then, and now, many nations including those in the region, breathed a sigh of relief that Saddam Hussein's nuclear ambitions were thwarted. The issue is that in the future, if the South Asian nuclear arms race escalates, it may well happen that Israel may find herself more deeply involved. Many liberal North American Jews recoil at the thought of nuclear weapons, and at most tolerate Israel's nuclear program as a necessary evil.

Israel's security needs in the future may increasingly become part of a complex, multilateral pattern of nuclear deterrence in the region. One hopes this does not emerge, but if it does, Israel's supporters need to toughen themselves for any eventuality. Indeed, these problems may persist, even if some progress is made on the Israeli-Palestinian dimensions of the peace process.

All this need not be a cause for despair. The nuclear genie cannot be put back in the bottle. Let us recall that the U.S.-U.S.S.R.-China confrontation lasted for nearly half a century without any nuclear event, by accident or design. There is no evidence that the leaders of India and Pakistan have evolved nuclear doctrines that would sanction first use. Nuclear disarmament in Asia is just not in the cards. Though many do not like to hear of it, deterrence has worked in the past, and is most likely to work in the future – though as always, there are no guarantees.

The question of refugees

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Lately, the plight of immigrants and refugees has once again been in the news. The federal Minister of Immigration, Lucienne Robillard, recently held yet another set of national hearings on this complex and ever-challenging problem. It also brought back to me the year and a half I spent in 1984 and 1985, when I was asked by the federal government to devise a new refugee determination system for the country.

Recently, I had a chance to see an address that Senator Jerry S. Grafstein gave as a Canadian representative, to the Council of Europe Parliamentary Assembly, which was held in Strasbourg, France, in late January.

Some of his remarks are worth quoting: "When it comes to the question of refugees, there is marked difference between the current ideas in Europe and Canada. Let me explain. Canada is a land of immigrants, a land of refugees. We as an immigrant society have discovered, after much careful study, that easy political rhetoric is much different from economic reality! We have learned that the politics of inclusion, of permanent settlement of refugees, are of economic and cultural benefit to our society. We learned to digest our differences. In brief, all classes in Canada have benefited from the fast economic and social inclusion of the waves of refugees that have washed against our shores. The faster the better!

"Toronto (considered by recent comparative studies the most livable city in the world in terms of civil society and safety) is my home and political base. One-third of our population in Toronto speak at home a first language other than English or French. Our police can arrest criminal suspects in 86 languages.

"Practically every member of this assembly could find in Toronto a fine restaurant to suit his natural origins. We thrive on ethnic diversity in our restaurants and our workplaces and political institutions.

"Our political structures and our economic structures are open and welcoming. Practically every region from Europe, Asia, Africa and South America is represented at our municipal government, whether elected or part of the bureaucracy as policy of social inclusion.

"In our Parliament, in Commons and Senate, we have members of Chinese, Armenian, German, French, Serbian, Italian, Albanian, Portuguese, Greek, Ukrainian, Polish, Lebanese, Swedish, Danish, Russian, Czech, Slovakian, Estonian, and the list goes on, including representatives from English, Welsh, Irish and Scottish groups, and last, but not least, our aboriginal peoples. I repeat, we thrive on our pluralism and diversity represented by practically every country here in the assembly having a Member of Parliament in Canada. This is why Canadians feel so much at home in the assembly of the Council of Europe."

Any of my readers who came to the New World as a refugee knows that this memory will never go away. That is doubly true for a land like Canada, which is a land of immigrants and refugees. I'm glad it is, and I hope it will remain so!

The Kirshner File

Contrasting memories subject of haunting film

By Sheldon Kirshner

interest, first as a child and then as a teenager.

Premiered in Canada at the recent Canadian International Documentary Film Festival in Toronto, Kinderland, Cinderland is a poignant study in juxtaposition. Spanning the years 1934 to 1996, and set in the Swabian town of Ulm, the movie turns on the sharply contrasting memories of a group of Jewish and Christian classmates after the rise of the Third Reich.

Seduced by the new ideology, the Christian girls recall the stirring torchlight parades organized by the triumphant Nazis, the allure of joining the Hitler Youth and the camaraderie of the times.

Virtually the only jarring note is sounded by a girl who was ostracized by virtue of the fact that her father was a socialist and therefore an opponent of the Nazi regime.

The innocent years they enjoy during the 1930s abruptly vanish with the outbreak of World War II. Rationing is introduced. Soldiers – brothers, fathers, relatives – are killed. The girls express shock when one of their own, the legendary Sophie Scholl, is exposed as a member of the anti-Nazi White Rose resistance movement, then summarily executed.

Bereft of fond reminiscences, the Jewish girls recall the economic boycotts, the anti-Semitic taunts and abuse of fellow students, the crass anti-Jewish signs in town (one read "Dogs and Jews not admitted"), the feeling of abandonment and the flight to safe havens in the United States and Palestine.

"Our parents generally didn't talk too much about that period," said Tiedemann, 46, whose mother appears briefly in the film. "But I wanted to know everything about it."

Finally, in 1994, Tiedemann, a graduate of the German Film and Television Academy in Berlin, decided that a film about her mother's generation might shed further light on Nazi Germany.

Teaming up with Ute Badura, a cinematographer who was born in eastern Germany in 1957, Tiedemann and her collaborator spent a year researching the topic, after which they co-wrote the script. They received support from the city of Ulm and financial backing from a host of institutional contributors.

In 1996, they started filming in Germany, Israel and the United States. Chillingly enough, they arrived in Tel Aviv just a week after an Islamic Jihad terrorist detonated a bomb that killed 13 civilians near the Dizengoff Centre.

The movie, which had its world premiere in Ulm last year, reunited several of the Jewish and Christian girls. They met at Tiedemann's mother's house. Despite nervousness on both sides, the rapport they established was touching and astonishing.

"They were at ease with each other," said Tiedemann. "They just talked and talked and talked." Some began a correspondence which continues to this day.

Looking back at the Nazi era, both Tiedemann and Badura (whose father was a member of the Nazi party during the last two years of the war) are still amazed that it even happened.

"It hurts," said Badura. "It's a lesson in what human beings are capable of. You have to deal with this again and again."

According to Tiedemann, a Jewish community has re-emerged in Ulm, the last of whose former Jewish residents were deported in 1942. After the war, a number of east European Jews settled in Ulm. Indeed, one of Tiedemann's classmates in the 1950s was descended from one of these families. Today, he is a teacher in Ulm. Since the late 1980s, the Jewish population has been supplemented by arrivals from the former Soviet Union. And so, contrary to Hitler's wishes, Ulm's connection with Jews has been re-established.

Travelling in Germany

Germany, understandably, is not on the itinerary of most Jewish travellers, even those who were born there or who have a family connection. Germany, after all, is soaked with Jewish blood.

But outside Israel, Germany probably contains more Jewish historical sites than any other country in the world. And it is worth noting that Germany's Jewish community is not only the fastest-growing one in Europe, but one of the largest.

With a population approaching 100,000, the community certainly appears to have a bright future, the presence of neo-Nazis notwithstanding. Six decades after the rise of Hitler, who could have predicted such a development?

Keeping these facts in mind, readers may be interested to know that two guidebooks about Germany's Jewish dimension, past and present, have recently been published.

Traveller's Guide to Jewish Germany (Pelican Publishing), by Billie Ann Lopez and Peter Hirsch, seems like a definitive work. With entries on scores of German towns and cities from Aachen and Celle to Ulm and Wurzburg, and with numerous photographs of synagogues, mikvahs and cemeteries, this 314-page volume looks like the last word on the subject.

As might be expected, the authors do not limit themselves to places with revived and thriving Jewish communities like Berlin, Frankfurt or Munich. Cities where Jews were displaced and/or murdered, but with palpable reminders of the past, are also part of their survey.

One criticism. There is insufficient information on present-day communities. It is an omission that should be remedied in the next edition.

Geoffrey Weill's 36-page pamphlet, Germany for the Jewish Traveller, produced under the auspices of the German National Tourist Board, is more topical, but not as comprehensive as Traveller's Guide to Jewish Germany.

Combining history with facts of current interest, Weill – a relative of the famous composer, Kurt Weill – presents his data in a breezy and accessible style, leading us to destinations from Augsburg and Bamberg to Saarbrucken and Rothenburg-Ob-Der-Tauber.

What is happiness? The answers are legion: Happiness is paying the last instalment on your mortgage. Happiness is not a station to arrive at but a manner of travelling. Happiness is not being pained in body or troubled in mind. Happiness is the interval between periods of unhappiness. The secret of happiness is not in doing what one likes, but in liking what one has to do.

Dennis Prager is author of such books as Think a Second Time, The Nine Questions People Ask About Judaism and Why the Jews – the Reason for Anti-Semitism – as well as a popular Los Angeles radio talk host. He divides his new book into two major segments: What are the greatest obstacles to happiness for most people and thoughts on how to deal with those obstacles; and the major attitudes and behavior necessary for achieving increased happiness.

His approach to this hoary question is psychologically sound, clear and honest. One common source of unhappiness is our tendency to compare ourselves with persons we think more fortunate than ourselves. But who knows with what demons – emotional, psychological, economic, social – they have to struggle? As someone sagely admitted. "The only happy people I know are people I don't know well."

Another reason for unhappiness is to concentrate on a flaw or difficulty, no matter how trivial, rather than on the larger picture. Imagine looking at a tiled ceiling from which one tile is missing – you will most likely concentrate on that missing tile. "The missing tile syndrome is ubiquitous. If you are overweight, all you see are flat stomachs and perfect physical specimens. If you have pimples, all you see is flawless skin. Women who have difficulty getting pregnant walk around seeing only pregnant women and babies. Unless we teach ourselves to concentrate on what we do have, we will end up obsessing over missing tiles and allow them to become insurmountable obstacles to happiness."

What about money? Doesn't it bring happiness? A degree of contentment and security, yes, but true happiness, not a chance. If the desire for money is largely a constant craving for material things or a desire to impress others, then it is a fool's quest. "Unhappy people at least have the fantasy that money will make them happy; unhappy rich people don't even have that."

Over the course of many years the author has asked high school seniors throughout North American whether they would first save their dog or a stranger if both were drowning. In every instant (except for some religious schools) about one-third of the students vote to save the dog, one-third to save the human and one-third simply cannot decide. Many students explain "I love my dog, I don't love a stranger." Prager writes "I am convinced that a reason for this growing preference for animals is that animals give unconditional love and people do not. But seeking for unconditional love assures unhappiness, because adult love is never unconditional."

The author insists that there are no free lunches. With regard to happiness there are three basic rules: Make peace with the fact that everything in life has a price, determine what that price is for anything you desire, choose whether to pay that price or to forgo what you desire. "Unless you follow all three of these rules, happiness is unattainable – because you will constantly be angry at the prices you pay for everything you have and everything you do."

Happiness, Prager believes, must be taken seriously, because whether we are happy or not affects not only us but our friends and family members. In this sense trying to be happy is no less than a moral responsibility.

A brief review of this kind can convey only a small portion of the richness of this thoughtful and helpful book.

Hebrew on your computer

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Last week we looked at pictures. This week: words.

Writing in Hebrew on your computer can pose a few challenges: does your computer know how to go from right to left? Have you downloaded Hebrew fonts that were designed for word processors and not the ones that were designed for surfing the Internet? And was your Hebrew font designed to work with a standard Israeli keyboard or for an English speaker who just wants to hunt and peck a few words? If it sounds a bit confusing, it can be. But with some work and patience, you can teach your computer Hebrew – for free.

Next step: fonts. First you have to download some Hebrew fonts, such as Shalom OldStyle, Shalom Script and Shalom Stick [http://www.jewishpost.com/jp0203/jpsoft.htm]. These are not identical to the commercial fonts used in Israel. On real Hebrew keyboards, the gimel is located where our "D" is found. But Shalom OldStyle places the gimel on our "G" to make typing easier for English speaking people. For a good introduction to writing in Hebrew, see Kabbalah's Information on Hebrew Fonts [http://www.kabsoft.com/fonts.htm].

Also note that these are fonts designed for use in a word processor. If you load them into your browser in order to surf the Internet in Hebrew, everything will come out as gibberish. To surf in Hebrew, you need completely different Hebrew fonts [http://dapey.reshet.co.il/help/2067.htm].

Looking for fancier fonts? CompuJudaica offers a free selection [http://www.zoots.com/cj/hebrew.htm#font]. For example, "David" is a True Type font for Windows that looks hand-printed. "Noam" is large and blocky, "Script" is a cursive flowing Hebrew font for invitations and "Torah" looks like writing from – you know. Virtual Jerusalem's Software Library has plenty for both Windows [http://www.software.virtual.co.il/dirs/windows_fonts.html] and Macintosh [http://www.software.virtual.co.il/dirs/mac_fonts.html].

If you need something a bit more specialized, you may have to pay. The Jewish Software Centre, for example sells several Jewish font packages [http://users.aol.com/jewishsoft/page15.html]. For example, "Catskills" is an adaptation of a classic font that presents English letters in a Hebrew style. Davka's Hebrew Font Gallery [http://www.davka.com/hebrewfg.htm] is a package of 25 fonts with everything from "Rashi"to "Hadassah Light."

You have your fonts. You have a word processor. Now it's time to speak to the world in Hebrew. If you want to be able to send e-mail in Hebrew, then don't miss Mikhtav [http://www.hevanet.com/dshivers/mikhtav/]. Once you download Mikhtav ("letter' in Hebrew) and install the various components into your system, you will be able to compose and send e-mail in Hebrew. There are detailed instructions and the creators of Mikhtav will be happy to receive your Hebrew e-mail to see if you've got the hang of it. Best of all, it's free.

Next week, I conclude my software survey with Jewish games, Hebrew tutors and translators, vendors and my pick of the best Jewish freeware I've seen.

Jewish Life

In search of a new Jewish home

By SUSAN BERRIN

Guest Voices

I've lived in Victoria for 16 years. We arrived as a young family: my husband (the new rabbi) and I, with our infant daughter, Noa. I can honestly say these 16 years have included some of my happiest years. They've certainly been my most productive years, even if we count only the three children I've borne and raised as mentshen.

I'm at ease with the west coast lifestyle: co-ops for babysitting; organic produce; wearing sandals all year round; worrying only when pushed to the boundaries of nail-biting anxiety.

I love Victoria. I love the fact that our neighbors share seedlings and harvest. Here, "garden" is as much a verb as it is a noun. If I didn't garden seriously, I'd forfeit much of the incidental but meaningful social exchange. I'd be excluded from the local chit-chat. Conversations would happen above me and around me.

I've been fortunate to grow a community of dear friends. Like-minded souls, and men and women I'd never dreamt of knowing. Victoria brings together the oddest assortment of people.

But once here, we make room for one another. Our lives expand to accommodate the stories of fellow travellers. Our hearts open to their sorrows and to their joys. I've had hundreds of people through my kitchen. And many of them hundreds of times. They bring laughter and questions. They come for comfort and guidance. They encircle me, sometimes with frustrating demands, more often with love.

Come this summer, though, I'm leaving. It came as a surprise to me, so content was I in this paradise. But I must admit it was my choice – a well-reasoned, thoroughly analysed, dissected, heart-wrenching choice.

We don't know yet where we're going. All we do know is that my husband and I and our children – ages 16, 12 and six – will be living somewhere else in August. I can only compare our situation to the feeling of having jumped out of an airplane. We're free-falling, tumbling, not yet reaching for the parachute cord. Friends comment, "You have such courage!"

Yes, we have courage to uproot and wander. But it's a fine line between courageous and crazy. We know we'll land, we'll walk again, do laundry and grow vegetables in another city. We'll again establish networks of support, learn the quickest carpool routes, find a friendly neighbor with a dog to be our pal.

We're midlifers. Our never-ending busyness, the cuddles and kisses could be half over; our moon, full and ripe, beginning to wane. Life's existential questions keep writing themselves onto the foggy bathroom mirror. "If not now, when?" means more when life's hourglass turns over. But this airplane jump isn't a midlife crisis. It's about our children. And being Jewish.

We have three children and a deep commitment to living an observant Jewish life. That's our problem with Victoria. For the past 16 years, we've made our spiritual lives fit into the confines of Victoria's small but warm Jewish community. When our eldest was two, we created a Jewish preschool. But since she turned five, we haven't been able to start a Jewish day school. The demographics of Victoria don't allow for it. Too few children per grade and too many other commitments for the parents.

As our children grow, we have less to offer them. We find ourselves stretching in ways we never intended. How do we, living in a place where open-mindedness and adaptability are the ultimate virtues, teach religious parameters and structure to our children? Our children have been blessed with solid roots. They belong to a community that hovers protectingly over them, showering them with the love of an enormous extended family. No anomie in sight for these three precious, warm-hearted creatures.

Our children have no formal route for Jewish education, no possibility of being students at the table of great Jewish books or inspiring Jewish teachers. They have few peers with whom to explore the tradition or travel the Jewish path. Only they fully observe Shabbat. From sundown on Friday to sundown on Saturday, they do not attend birthday parties or movies, shop or play on the computer. They need a chevrah, a group of friends, their own teenage community of Shabbat observers, where they can laugh and sing, roam and wander unselfconsciously as Jewish children.

Leaving the Garden of Eden is not easy. And anything east of Eden is tilling a harder, rockier soil. I leave with a deep sadness, a feeling of loss that hurts into my bones.

We leave a synagogue that is truly a community, one that we have helped to build for 16 years. It is housed in a beautiful building, a sacred space of tremendous proportion. Our shul fills on Shabbat with a community that comes together in the hope of speaking to God while being in the presence of each other. Together we tend the dying, cook and care for those in need. We dance together in celebration and mark the passage of time, the milestones in our lives. Friendships are built over time as we create this shared history.

And yet we all feel – my husband, my children and I – that the time for uprooting is now. Although we leave what many might describe as a "perfect life," we hope to find a more engaging and fuller Jewish community, one that enriches each of us and all of us. As we prepare to leave, we gather sparks from our many friends' lives, and hope to kindle with these sparks a new flame of friendship and community in our next home.

Jewish War Veterans celebrate Israel's 50th

By STACEY STEIN
Student Intern

TORONTO — The Israeli ambassador, the French consul general and over 600 guests were on hand to celebrate Israel's 50th anniversary at a recent gala dinner held by the Jewish War Veterans of Canada.

In his speech, Ambassador David Sultan praised the veterans' contribution to Israel.

"In Israel, we owe a great deal to the war veterans of the Jewish brigade who participated in World War II and those who participated in the War of Independence," he said. "They are not only heroes of war, but also heroes of peace. For it is thanks to them that our neighbors have gradually come to realize that Israel is not a passing phenomenon, but rather she is here to stay."

Sultan said he was honored to be at the event, celebrating Israel's anniversary with the war vets.

"Fifty years ago, many of you believed that we would re-establish our solidarity and our history," he said. "And here we are celebrating 50 years of achievement that we can all be proud of."

The event, held at Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto synagogue in Thornhill, also featured guest speaker John Loftus, a lawyer and former prosecutor with the Nazi war crimes unit.

While working for the U.S. Justice Department, Loftus accidentally discovered secret vaults in a small town outside Washington, D.C. They contained classified documents revealing that many of the Nazis he was supposed to indict were on the government payroll. He then resigned from the Justice Department and appeared on 60 minutes to tell his story, and wrote books detailing the West's complicity with the Nazis and indifference toward the Jews. His most recent book is entitled The Secret War Against the Jews.

In his speech, he discussed how American foreign policy is driven by oil interests in Arab countries.

"The problem is that for the better part of the 20th century, our [U.S.] State Department, your [Canada's] External Affairs and our intelligence community have decided that it really is in North America's long-term national interest to obtain the cheap and consistent supply of oil," Loftus said. "The Arabs have it, the Jews don't – it's as simple as that. It's not about bigotry or anti-Semitism. It's about greed, it's about loyalties."

He also discussed how governments hide important information from the general public, noting that during World War II, western powers knew about Hitler's concentration camps early on and withheld this information from their local Jewish communities.

"Many Jews don't have a clue about their own history," Loftus said. "And you don't because one-third of our history is classified, buried down in those vaults."

Loftus also commended the resiliency of the Jewish people.

Addressing the audience, Loftus described how the strength of the Jewish people has always prevailed.

"You've won," he said. "You've beaten Hitler, the Holocaust, the Arabs, the oil companies…bit by bit, brick by brick, you built a nation."

These sentiments were later echoed by Sam Pasternack, the Jewish War Vets' national commander.

"Our people are a very resilient people," he said. "We are also a people of extraordinary faith and optimism…for us, it wasn't a matter if Israel would be reborn, it was only when."

In his address, Pasternack also noted that the percentage of Jews enlisted in the Canadian Armed Forces in World War II was greater than the national average.

"Happy birthday Israel," he concluded, "may G-d bless you with a true peace, security, happiness and protection."

Sanctuary named for Rabbi, Mrs. Burak

TORONTO — Tributes, toasts and reminiscences will mark the dedication of Beth Jacob V'Anshe Dridz's sanctuary in honor of Rabbi and Mrs. Moses Burak on June 21.

Rabbi Burak has been the congregation's spiritual leader for 35 years. His wife Toby has been a leader in the sisterhood, and has been active in other synagogue functions.

"I started with the congregation when it was still in a big, beautiful shul on Henry Street," Rabbi Burak said. "At that time we were having trouble getting a minyan for weekday services.

"We had to avail ourselves of the services of a shul klapper. That is, one of our regulars would knock (klap) on people's doors to ask them to fill out the minyan."

"I finally agreed that the time had come to move north," said Rabbi Burak. The congregation resettled in Bathurst Manor, on Overbrook Place.

Rabbi Burak instituted daily services including two morning minyanim on weekdays, and a variety of classes and discussions.

The congregation has had an influx of young members and a new associate spiritual leader, Rabbi Jay Kelman.

"We've had quite a few adventures over the past years," said Rabbi Burak. "There'll be some interesting stories to tell."

The dedication begins at 10 a.m. and includes brunch. Tickets are $20.

Conference explores past, future of community

Canadian Jewish history often ignored, says Abella

BY SIMONE JOSEPH
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Canadian academics have shown a lack of interest in Canadian Jewish history, said Irving Abella, York University history professor.

"Until the past decade or two, Canadian academics have displayed a singular lack of interest in the origins and achievements of the various communities and immigrant groups which make up this country," he said.

Abella, along with Deborah Dash Moore, a professor of religion at Vassar College, and Ramsay Cook, a York University professor, were among the speakers at a recent conference entitled A Heritage in Transition: A Conference on the Study of Canadian Jewry, organized by the Centre for Jewish Studies at York.

He highlighted aspects of Canadian Jewry from well before Confederation until this century.

The early decades of this century, said Abella, were "a period of dreadful living and working conditions, of poverty and hardships for the Jews."

But he also spoke about the "golden period of Canadian Jewry," the period before Canada became a nation in 1867. During this time, there were "Jewish doctors, officers, mayors and bank presidents. There was even a Jewish bank.

"Seventy-five years ago, anyone could get on the CPR transcontinental in Halifax and travel across the country to Vancouver, and to almost every town, village or hamlet across the country... There was a Jewish presence: a family, a storekeeper, a farmer, even a synagogue," Abella said.

But even with this rich history, Canadian scholars have missed out on important parts of the study of Canadian Jewish history, said Abella.

"There is as yet no study of Jewish immigration to Canada, no comparison study of the role... of these remarkable men and women who transformed Canadian Jewish society," he said.

Very little has been written about the Canadian Jewish labor movement, Abella said. "This remarkable generation of working men and women has been badly served by scholars." Other than a book on women in the garment industry in Toronto, "there is no major study of the Jewish trade unions."

Abella said the perception of Jews as newcomers to Canada is a historical misconception. "Jews were here almost from the beginning of European settlement of this land. Jews are not newcomers in Canada and we ought to stop behaving as if they were," he said.

Moore, who spoke about the current state of American Jewish studies, said she used to be frustrated by the lack of opportunity to teach the history of Jews in the U.S.

Recently, however, she has noticed a change in attitude. "American Jewish historians have won half the battle of legitimacy. American Jewish history has come of age. There currently exists a viable historiography of American Jews."

Living standards predicted to drop

TORONTO — If current trends continue, by 2025 our standard of living will be lower, our personal insecurity will increase, and a global culture will develop, says a sociology professor at York University.

Stuart Schoenfeld made these projections about the future of Canadian Jewish life at a York University conference organized by the Centre for Jewish Studies at York.

According to Schoenfeld, recent discussions of the Jewish future have mainly been projections of internal trends in the Jewish community, such as intermarriage rates, birth rates and other trends.

His paper The Context of Canadian Jewish Life over The Next Generation: Projections and Challenges, which was the subject of his presentation, focuses on how the social environment of the next generation of Jews will change.

The generation growing up today may have a lower standard of living than their parents, he says. "There is a high cost of being Jewish."

These costs, says Schoenfeld, involve sending children to summer camp, making donations to charities and paying for a synagogue membership. In the future, it will be harder to maintain our current affluence level, he says.

Schoenfeld says the generation growing up today will have fewer prospects for secure, long-term employment. "It is possible that the insecurity of secure long-term employment may reinforce the established tendencies of Jews to work as entrepreneurs and self-employed professionals rather than as employees," he says.

Jews are facing increasingly risky personal lives, says Schoenfeld. "While Jews seem to have somewhat higher rates of lasting marriages, their divorce rate has risen significantly over the past generation."

He says that "Women need to anticipate the greater likelihood that they will at some point have to support themselves (and possibly children) with only the assistance of court-mandated child support – which may or may not be enforced," he says.

On a positive note, he says that Jews will become more involved in religion. "A second response to the emerging conditions of the next generation is one of relying upon group solidarity as a pragmatic resource. –S.J.

As we observe his Yartzeit next week, the third of Tamuz, we pledge to rededicate ourselves to his teachings and continue his sacred work with renewed enthusiasm and vitality.

May we soon witness the rewards of these efforts with the arrival of Mashiach who will usher in the era of universal peace and tranquility.

Rookie Grit Jacques Saada is rising through the ranks

Scene in Ottawa

By STEPHEN BINDMAN

But for a rookie Liberal backbencher in a town with lots of rookie Liberal backbenchers, Saada has been popping up regularly in some pretty important places.

Last month, he was chosen by Foreign Affairs Minister Lloyd Axworthy to head a Canadian fact-finding mission of parliamentarians to the troubled Mexican region of Chiapas.

Earlier this year, he was a member of the official Canadian delegation at the signing of the international treaty banning landmines.

And perhaps most significantly, he was the co-chair of the recent biennial Liberal party convention and schmooze and boozefest.

When Grits from across the country gave Prime Minister Jean Chrétien a resounding vote of confidence, it was Saada who announced the results on national television and raised the PM's hand in victory.

"The image I'll keep in my mind forever when I made the announcement was the eyes of Aline Chrétien," he recalls.

"It was just so moving. It grabbed you right in the guts, it was really fascinating. I made the announcement and when you're on stage your eyes go round and I just happened to look at her at this time. It was really a moving moment."

So who is this Saada guy?

A 50-year-old native of Tunisia, he was elected last year in the Montreal-area riding of Brossard-La Prairie where he defeated a Bloc Québécois candidate by 7,000 votes.

His family moved to France in 1958 after his North African birthplace gained independence and after six months in Israel on a kibbutz as a member of Hashomer Hatzair he came to Canada.

Saada says politics is his fourth career after stints as a teacher and school administrator, owner of a translation business and government consultant in international development.

"Being an MP is a combination of all of my other careers. It's really an exciting job."

It is more than a job it is a passion.

"There is no limit to the fields you want to address, there is no limit to the depth with which you want to address them. The only limitations you have really are your ability to digest and your time. It is even more demanding than I thought it was going to be, but in terms of my appreciation of the job in itself it's even much more than I was hoping for."

The father of four – and soon to be first-time grandfather – calls himself a Jew "more by culture and guts than by religion."

"The only High Holy Day that we all respect in the family is Yom Kippur, but we do respect the more historical sides of our culture, of our background.

"For example, we celebrate Passover as a celebration of freedom. To me that's very important, especially for my childrçn, to learn not only the values of freedom but to learn also that the people from whom they descend had to go through this pain to gain freedom."

He is especially proud that his campaign team includes Indians and Pakistanis, "you can see at the same table the Imam and the president of the Jewish association.

"I'm pushing for this kind of getting together and knowing each other and trying to move ahead together. To me that epitomizes really what my dream is. I realize it's utopia but if you don't have a dream then nothing can be achieved ever."

"It's logical for anybody to aspire to better in life, to bigger, to better.

"Promotion is part of what gives us a drive to do whatever you do. But I've been extremely happy with what I've been able to do so far.

"When you feel that you are able to move things, even if it's slow, if it's modest, you've got to remain very humble about it but you are moving ahead.

St. Catharines Jewish cemetery re-dedicated after desecration

ST. CATHARINES — Close to 500 people of different faiths gathered here June 7 for the re-dedication of Jewish gravestones and a Holocaust memorial that were desecrated in April.

"This is the start of a new beginning and will give us more strength after the setbacks," said Rabbi Martin Applebaum, who presided over the emotional service.

This city's only Jewish cemetery was vandalized in two separate attacks in April. Two men were arrested and charged with several offences, including causing indignity to human remains.

One of them had ties to neo-Nazi organizations, and remains in custody. His pre-trial was slated for last week.

A total of 43 tombstones were toppled or damaged, flower beds were trampled, windows smashed, and a Holocaust monument desecrated.

Damage was estimated at between $5,000 and $8,000.

Members of St. Catharines' B'nai Israel Synagogue joined loved ones of those buried in the cemetery for the re-dedication service. Also in attendance were Israeli consul general Jehudi Kinar; Ontario Attorney General Charles Harnick; Monsignor Melvin Schaefer of the St. Catharines diocese; Rabbi Martin Goldberg of Temple Beth El in Niagara Falls, N.Y.; St. Catharines mayor Tim Rigby; as well as local and federal politicians.

A container of washed stones was set out so visitors and family members could place them on the new gravestones as symbols of remembrance.

Synagogue president Sam Walters said he found the presence of so many people and faith groups at the service comforting.

"I believe this will give the Jewish people the strength to stand up and say this will never happen again," he said. "It makes us feel we do not stand alone."

Klatt's computer cut off from Internet access

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Another door being used by Bernard Klatt to get access to the Internet was shut down last week, making it harder for him to host Web sites devoted to extremist causes.

Valley Internet Providers (VIP) terminated Klatt's access to the World Wide Web through its company after inquiries from The CJN revealed Klatt's company, Fairview Technology Centre (FTC), was either directing Internet inquiries regarding the extremist Web Sites to other computer hosts or continuing to host the Web sites himself. FTC's access to the Internet – the actual physical connection – came through VIP, which serves clients in the Okanagan Valley area of British Columbia.

Dan Hidlebaugh, operations manager for VIP, said the company picked up FTC's client list after FTC and BC Telecom ended their contractual relationship recently, severing FTC's "pipeline" to the Internet. That left Fairview's clients, many of them senior citizens and members of computer clubs, without access to the World Wide Web, Hidlebaugh said.

VIP agreed to provide them with Internet access while at the same time allowing FTC's computer to remain on its system so that it could forward e-mail from FTC's clients to their new e-mail address at VIP. Hidlebaugh said when VIP took over FTC's clients, its technicians purged FTC's computers of the extremist Web sites. But, he added, "I'm not sure if he's capable of getting in the back door."

A search of the Internet earlier last week revealed that FTCnet continued to host Zundelsite, Stormfront and Freedomsite (Canadian Patriots Network) after BC Tel ceased providing FTC with access to the World Wide Web.

Klatt ended his ties with BC Tel after the telephone company amended its contracts to make those hosting Web sites liable for the sites' content.

Speaking before VIP terminated FTC's Internet access, Sol Littman, Canadian director of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, called on BC Attorney General Ujjal Dosanjh to review the possibility of prosecuting Klatt.

"In view of the fact he is still operating in the same old way, the FTCnet matter has to be examined again," Littman said.

Dosanjh has said there are insufficient grounds to support a criminal prosecution of Klatt.

In a news release, Littman said he was "especially sorry for the citizens of Oliver who hoped they had heard the last of Klatt and the negative attention his operation brought to the town."

Oliver Mayor Linda Larson agreed the town has received negative publicity, but she blamed Littman for much of it, saying he hurt the community when he called it "the hate capital of Canada."

Klatt, she said, does not represent anyone in Oliver but himself. "Klatt is a quiet guy who keeps to himself. No one knew anything regarding support of these groups.

"It's been very difficult," she continued. "That word 'hate' that Littman used for this community is very powerful and it's hard to get rid of. There's no white supremacist group here. Only a telephone line."

The people of Oliver have steered clear of Klatt once they became aware of what he was doing but "the word hate has left a stigma on the international level," she said.

When a resident told someone in England she was visiting from Oliver, she was told "'oh, that hate place,'" Larson said.

"How do you get rid of that? I'd have to save a pod of whales or a rainforest to get rid of the stigma."

Larson acknowledged the publicity about Klatt has educated the community of 4,200 on the extremist right. Since Klatt became well known, the town has set up a multicultural committee to examine issues related to racism, such as a possible community response to a racist group coming to the area. And on March 21, the community backed a poster project to commemorate the international day against racism, she said.

Two weeks ago, a film crew from Vision TV was in town to film a documentary about the town's relationship with the local Osoyoos Indian band while Rogers Communication recorded a program on the community's multiculturalism festival.

Meanwhile, Justice Minister Anne McLellan has agreed to a request by Dosanjh to expand the review of the country's anti-hate legislation to include suggestions from British Columbia that would toughen the law.

British Columbia proposes to make it a Criminal Code offence to possess hate material if possession was for the purpose of distributing it to promote hatred.

It also proposes

- to update definitions in the law to cover hate spread by computer and to allow the seizure of computer hard drives (memory storage);
- to expand the list of identifiable groups protected from hate propaganda to include such categories as sex and sexual orientation.

Zukerman named to direct NACO

By PAULA SMITH
Special to The CJN

OTTAWA — Pinchas Zukerman has been appointed music director of the National Arts Centre Orchestra (NACO).

The announcement was made by The National Arts Centre (NAC) at a recent video press conference, via link-up with Zukerman, who was travelling in Europe.

At the press conference, Zukerman talked about plans for the week-long celebration of Israel's 50th anniversary, which will take place at the NAC from Nov. 15 to 19.

The plans include programs for children, and exhibits of Israeli art and artists from the past 50 years. There will also be free noon-hour and evening concerts on the L'Chaim Stage in the foyer of the NAC.

A gala concert fundraiser will be held on Nov. 18 to raise funds for the NACO tour to the Middle East in 2000. Zukerman said the concert will benefit NACO and will also raise funds for a proposed program that will bring Israeli, Palestinian and Canadian youth together to study and play music.

Zukerman said he will spend at least 10 weeks a year in Ottawa.

National Bible contest winners

The contest, held at the Hillel Academy and the Agudath Israel Synagogue of Ottawa, drew 178 students from Winnipeg, Calgary, Vancouver, Victoria, Montreal, Toronto and Ottawa.

All contestants, students from grades 5 to OAC, from both day and supplementary Jewish schools were qualifiers from the February Regional Chidon. Students at the national contest competed over a day and a half in one of four groups: an English division for supplementary schools, and three Hebrew divisions for day schools.

Yael Seliger, director of Education Services at the Board of Jewish Education, Toronto, noted the level of excitement of heading into the finals at Agudath Israel. All contestants had participated in two difficult oral rounds, then approximately 40 students moved on to the next level, and finally it was down to three to five students from each of the four divisions.

The three judges presiding over the contest were: Prof. B. Levy, from McGill University; Rabbi J. Unterman, Toronto Board of Jewish Education; and Mr. Y. Elmalech, Torah Education Department of the World Zionist Organization. All agreed that the level of knowledge exhibited by the students was astounding.

"The stakes are always high," said Seliger, "and in the end only the top three students in each division are finally declared the winners, but in truth, all the participating students were winners of the highest caliber motivated by the love of studying Torah."

The winners this year are: Supplementary School Division, Michael Chochinov, Temple Israel, Ottawa; Ethan Orwin, Downtown Jewish Community School, Toronto; and Ilana Lucas, Beth Tikvah Congregational School, Toronto. Day School Division, grades 5 and 6; Saar Warner-Lipton, Associated (Finch), Toronto; Leah Poliszuk, Netivot HaTorah, Toronto; and Shalom Naumann, Eitz Chaim (Patricia), Toronto. Kalah Israel, Etya Barnea, Eitz Chaim (Viewmount), Toronto. Grades 7 and 8; Shoshana Winter, Netivot Hatorah, Toronto; Mark Edelstein, United Synagogue Day School, (Bayview), Toronto; and Jordan Pelc, United Synagogue Day School (Bayview), Toronto. Grades 9 to OAC; Carolyn Gehr, Herzliah (Snowdon), Montreal; Aviyoel Sokol, Yeshivat Or Chaim, Toronto; and Aliza Kaplan, The Gray Academy, Winnipeg; and Sharon Weltman, Ulpanat Orot, Toronto.

"בקיבוץ יד מרדכי. המתים שנמלו כאן
עדיין משתכלים מן החלונות כמו ילדים חולים
שלא נותנים להם לצאת החוצה לשחק
ובמורד הגבעה עושים הצנת הקרב שהיה
למטיילים ולתיירים. חיילים עשויים מפח דק
קמים ונופלים וקמים. מתי פח וחיי פח

Minds meet at gathering of media, faith groups

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

OTTAWA — Faith groups should demand more and better coverage from Canadian media. At the same time, the media should pay more attention to, and show greater sensitivity toward, religious groups and issues, a two-day conference heard here last week.

Some 300 delegates to Canada's first-ever Faith and the Media conference, held at Carleton University, debated how the media can and should improve coverage of religion, and what faith groups can do to bring that about.

Delegates from over a dozen religious organizations rubbed shoulders with reporters and editors – from both the religious and the secular press – and public relations practitioners. There was general agreement on the idea that religion is important in most Canadians' lives, but less consensus on what media outlets should be doing to reflect that.

The Jewish community was represented by Rabbi Reuven Bulka of Ottawa, CJN editor Mordechai Ben-Dat, and several communal officials.

Topics examined included whether faith groups and the media can work together, how things seem from a religious point of view, and how to cover "hot potato" issues like abortion and homosexuality.

Unresolved was what constituted coverage of religion versus coverage of spiritual and ethical issues.

But for the most part, media representatives were taken to task for under-reporting or ignoring religion, or reporting on it insensitively.

A report by one-time Globe and Mail religion writer Barrie Zwicker said, "There's isn't nearly as much faith coverage as there should be," but what there is suffers from too much emphasis on religion and not enough on spirituality.

Canadians are hungry for spirituality, delegates heard, and are far more religious than the media believe. An Angus-Reid poll released at the conference showed that six out of 10 Canadians say religion is an important part of their lives, while another survey showed that 6.2 million Canadians attend religious services every week.

But the poll showed that 65 percent of those who attend a house of worship weekly believe the media do a poor job of covering faith and religion.

To indicate where the media's priorities are, the survey revealed that there are 76 full-time sports reporters at Canada's 19 largest daily newspapers, and just five religion writers.

Several speakers noted an anomaly: Jews received media coverage well out of proportion to their numbers.

Author Lois Sweet revealed the findings of a scan of over 1,300 clippings, and said that even though the results are unscientific, a visitor from outer space would conclude that Canada's largest religious groups are Roman Catholics and Jews.

Canada's 1991 census showed that 45 percent of Canadians were Catholic, while just 1.2 percent were Jewish. Minorities such as Hindus, Buddhists, Muslims and Sikhs, who together comprised 2.8 percent of the population, are often treated as media "oddities," and receive almost no serious coverage, Sweet said.

(There was no discussion of whether the Jewish community welcomed the coverage, or what form it took.)

Other areas explored at the groundbreaking conference included:

• There is "no bigger story" than religion because many issues dividing people are ethical and moral, said Peggy Wehmeyer, religion correspondent for ABC News and the first such reporter for the U.S. networks. Religion becomes part of stories on ethics, gays, racism, immigration and many other issues. But the national media suffer from "religious illiteracy."

• Sweet, author of God in the Classroom, conceded that journalists bring their own, sometimes secular, biases to their work. Religion writing in Canada suffers from "benign neglect," and current religion pages in newspapers "are designated for the converted, like the Wheels section."

At the concluding plenary, Sweet said the media should take religion more seriously and "cover it as if it matters," while faith groups should demand better and more accurate reporting, and adopt "non-defensive" attitudes.

• Grounds for complaints from religious groups that the media ignore them are "shaky at best," said Peter Desbarats, former dean of the journalism school at the University of Western Ontario. However, coverage of religion in Canada is "extensive, if not deep." But the media fail to convey how important religion is to Canadians, partly because journalists are "rationalists" and religion represents a "fundamentalist" view. He, too, noted that Jews receive disproportionately high coverage.

• Globe and Mail editor William Thorsell was taken to task by faith leaders and delegates for his stand that there's no reason for his paper to cover religion, unless it affects public policy. Thorsell said religion "is just one part of sociology."

• The media should pay attention to religion, "not because it is good or right, but because it is important," said University of Manitoba religion professor John Stackhouse. Religion "weaves its way through everything."

But in the final analysis, if a person finds God, inner peace and harmony, "and if the Globe, Macleans or the CBC don't pay attention, who cares?"

Students explore Holocaust

By WENDY SCHNEIDER
Correspondent

HAMILTON — One of the Hamilton Jewish community's most far-reaching and successful programs is its annual High School Symposium on the Holocaust planned by the Holocaust Education Committee.

This year's event, held recently at McMaster University, attracted approximately 500 students from several high schools in the area.

The keynote speaker was Holocaust survivor, Alicia Appleman-Jurman, who captivated the audience with vivid descriptions of an idyllic childhood in Poland, brutally interrupted by the German occupation.

A natural storyteller, she brought the horrors of the past to life, as she skillfully recounted the series of events that transformed the lives of her family through ghettoization, deportation, sickness and betrayal to their ultimate deaths.

Her account of events after the war was equally compelling, as she described the long journey by ship to Palestine, the hope in the hearts of her fellow passengers as they caught their first glimpse of Haifa, and the brutal treatment they received at the hand of the British soldiers who boarded their ship and threw many of the passengers overboard.

Appleman-Jurman told the audience she feels compelled to bear witness to the experiences of a million and a half children who never lived to tell their own stories and to attack the myth that they went like sheep to slaughter. She further communicated that message in her description of numerous acts of heroism and self-sacrifice carried out by her contemporaries.

Following the keynote address, students were divided into small groups, where they heard further testimony from local survivors.

Among the speakers was Ed Carter-Edwards, a Smithville resident who was one of 168 Allied airmen shot down in enemy territory during the war and sent to Buchenwald for three months. Their story is the subject of a National Film Board documentary, The Lucky Ones.

TOWARD 2001

Meeting the Needs of the New Century

An Optimistic Steiner Looks Ahead

As UJA Federation president Joseph Steiner begins his second term, Adi Neuberger talked to him about the challenges ahead.

What were some of the most important issues facing the Jewish community this past year?

Internal unity was our primary concern after the fallout from the proposed conversion legislation in Israel last fall hit home. From the start UJA Federation acted as a unifying force by facilitating dialogue between interested parties and through the dissemination of factual information to the community.

Other ongoing projects such as building a new Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto and the growth of UJA Federation's $150 million Legacy Campaign also warranted a great deal of our attention this past year.

Speaking of the Legacy Campaign...how's that shaping up one year after its launch?

The endowment side of Legacy is doing extremely well. Thanks to the efforts of some of UJA Federation's most supportive donors, as well as other communal leaders, Legacy has raised over $60 million in endowments, most of which are already paid in full. There is still work to be done to boost Legacy's capital fund raising so that we can strengthen existing communal facilities, and build new ones, especially in York Region, where one third of our Jewish population lives. The economy is doing well and as a result so are many of our community members. Now is the time for all of us to consider investing in the future.

As we approach the second year of your term as President, what issues are emerging that are taking top priority at UJA Federation?

We will be focusing more energy and resources on expanding Jewish education, especially supplementary and informal Jewish education. Our day school system is one of the strongest and most sophisticated in the world, but there are still many children who are not benefiting from it.

Providing more services and programs for Jews living in York region is also a big priority for UJA Federation in the coming years. We've already come a long way through the opening of our first York Region satellite office but there's so much more we need to do to make those living north of Steeles feel like they are part of the community.

How do you see the role of UJA Federation evolving as we embark on the millennium?

I believe the community is increasingly recognizing the central role of UJA Federation in its ability to assess the needs of the community and to plan for fulfilling those needs. UJA Federation is able to look at the overall picture like no other communal organization can.

Why was celebrating Israel's 50th so important for UJA Federation and the entire community?

No other single organization has the combined manpower, skills and resources to organize the entire community for such an elaborate, inclusive celebration. Everyone came together under the auspices of UJA Federation and the Consulate of Israel because, although our community is undergoing many changes, the centrality of Israel remains constant. Since UJA Federation was created, one of its main purposes is to provide meaningful ties between Jews in the Diaspora and the people of Israel. It's a vital link that strengthens our eternal bond with our homeland.

How does your experience as President measure up to your previous expectations of what

Most of my prior community involvement focused on Jewish education so until the last few years I had very little exposure to the broader community. From where I sit now I have a much bigger picture of our community and the myriad activities that are providing the Jewish connection to thousands on a daily basis. We have a tremendous network of programs and services and thousands of volunteers. We have a strong foundation that allows us to go forward into the future with pride, confidence and vision.

UJA Federation's Campaign For Fifty

UJA Federation's most ambitious annual campaign will go a long way toward helping Jewish Toronto's central organization meet the needs of a growing community, says Campaign Vice-Chair Glennie Lindenberg.

Lindenberg recently previewed the upcoming Campaign for Fifty — a dramatic departure from past campaigns — to more than 200 community members at UJA Federation's Annual General Meeting. The objective is to raise $50 million annually by 2001. That's $13.5 million more than the amount raised in last year's campaign. In order to achieve what campaign leaders call "a bold beginning for a new Jewish century," UJA Federation will be asking donors to pledge for 3 years, based on a 25% increase with additional gifts going toward new initiatives in three areas: strengthening Jewish identity, protecting the vulnerable and furthering Jewish rescue.

"The focus of our message," said Lindenberg, "will be to stress the life-giving work of UJA Federation and to encourage all of our UJA Federation leadership to speak proudly and boldly about the primacy of UJA Federation in our community."

One hundred and twenty campaign division chairs and vice-chairs will lead UJA Federation's efforts to contact more than 27,000 supporters. Lindenberg is urging contributors to return to their highest gift ever, which for many, was during the 1989 campaign.

"Our campaign has not significantly grown in the past ten years — although as you know, our community has grown tremendously in that period — while government funding to our agencies has been cut," explained Lindenberg. "Campaign leadership has taken our goal of $50 million very seriously and we are determined to produce outstanding results."

The Campaign for Fifty is being chaired by Brent Belzberg and Larry Tanenbaum. Judy Engel heads the Women's Campaign and Abe Glowinsky, Glennie Lindenberg and Howard Price are Campaign Vice-Chairs.

Legacy Planned Giving Chair, Leslie Gales

Legacy Leaps Beyond $60 Million

UJA Federation's $150 million Legacy endowment and capital campaign is off to "a great start," according to Leslie Gales, Chair of Planned Giving for Legacy.

"It's been an absolutely marvelous beginning," Gales told UJA Federation's Annual General Meeting last week. "The response has been tremendous."

Since Legacy started, more than $60 million has been raised - funds which will be used to secure the future of Toronto's Jewish community through the strengthening of communal infrastructure, programs and services. Over $4 million in Legacy donations, will, for example, be directed toward the construction of a new building for the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

Gales and others leading the unprecedented community fund raising effort are attributing the campaign's success to an improved economic climate, new tax incentives applying to charitable donations of stock and other assets and Legacy's diverse range of gift giving opportunities.

Resignations reduce rabbinical ranks in Winnipeg

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Jewish community's rabbinical and cantorial ranks have been significantly reduced this spring, as four rabbis and two prominent cantors have left.

Of those leaving, Toronto readers will probably be most familiar with Rosh Pina Congregation's Cantor Hesh Mayersdorf. Originally from New York, Cantor Mayersdorf was a chazzan for 14 years in Toronto before coming to the Rosh Pina two years ago. His departure comes about as a result of financial problems plaguing Winnipeg's second largest synagogue and the cantor's unhappiness here.

"We encountered some wonderful people in Winnipeg," says Cantor Mayersdorf, "but, sadly, we found that the Jewish institutions here are more concerned about politics than mentshlechkeit."

Instead of being appreciated for his talents, Mayersdorf says, he kept hearing people wondering why he was here.

"I found the community is fixated on doing things a certain way and were not open to change," he says. "The [Asper Jewish Community] Campus is a wonderful thing, and I hope it gives the community a shot in the arm, but to grow, Yiddishkeit needs more than a new community centre.

"I tried to do the best I could musically and instil some Yiddishkeit."

The synagogue hardest hit by change has been Temple Shalom, Winnipeg's only Reform congregation. Richard Yaffe, Temple Shalom's longtime cantor and choir director, left his position at the end of February, citing unhappiness with the "process surrounding discussions" of a new two-year contract. Cantor Yaffe had been associated with Temple Shalom for 23 years of the congregation's 28-year existence. In that time, he has signed numerous two-year contracts without any difficulty.

"Other issues arose that weren't part of any discussions," he says.

"Assumptions were made that I would object to certain things, but I was never asked. My role as cantor and choir director had evolved considerably over the years. The music component of services at Temple Shalom also changed over the years to reflect the preference of rabbis, boards and members as well as current trends in temple music. In the past, this was accomplished through dialogue. I wish I had been given the opportunity to participate in constructive dialogue with the present board, in order to understand its vision of music at Temple Shalom."

A lawyer by profession and a native Winnipegger, Cantor Yaffe has no plans to leave the city. He says he would like to continue to work as a chazzan and choir director. He is also thinking about forming a Jewish community choir and reports that he has had several encouraging calls from people who have sung under his direction.

The synagogue is also losing its spiritual leader of the last 10 years. Rabbi Jeffrey Gale is leaving to take a position with a much larger synagogue in Wantegh, N.Y., 35 miles from Manhattan.

"After 10 years, I felt it was time to move on," he says.

Looking back over his accomplishments in Winnipeg, he points to the growth of Temple Shalom's school under his guidance and the greater acceptance of Reform Judaism and Reform philosophy in Winnipeg's Jewish community, as he sees it. As examples, he cites the Board of Jewish Education's pluralistic attitude, his appointment as a teacher at Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate and the acceptance of egalitarianism in the city's Conservative synagogues.

He is disappointed, however, that his own congregation – which numbers about 100 families – has grown little during his tenure, and also about the departure of Cantor Yaffe. But he emphasizes that the fact that they are both severing ties with the shul is coincidental.

The most recent rabbi to announce his departure is Rabbi Yacov Benamou, the rabbi of the Herzlia Adas-Yeshurun Synagogue, south Winnipeg's only Orthodox congregation. The Morrocan-born Rabbi Benamou has been at the Herzlia for three years. He is leaving to become principal of a Sephardi day school in Chicago.

'Time to move on'

As a result of Rabbi Benamou's departure, the city's only Orthodox rabbi will be the Lubavitch Rabbi Avraham Altein of the Ashkenazi Shul in North Winnipeg. (There are three other small Orthodox synagogues in North Winnipeg in addition to a Chabad House where Rabbi Altein also presides, but none of the three can afford a full-time rabbi.)

In the south end, the board of the Shaarey Zedek Synagogue, the city's largest congregation, decided not to renew the contract of Rabbi Deborah Schloss, who was the number 2 rabbi after Rabbi Allan Meyerowitz.

Rabbi Schloss has been hired by the Beth Yeshurun Congregation in Houston, Tex., a city with a Jewish population of about 50,000. The 2,300-family synagogue is one of the largest in North America, Rabbi Schloss says. There are two other rabbis on staff. Rabbi Schloss takes up her new position on Aug. 1.

Finally, Rabbi Yossi Rivlin, the Board of Jewish Education's director of Judaic Studies, has had one of the shorter tenures in Winnipeg. By mutual agreement, he is returning to New York at the end of the school year after just one year here. Although he was successful in creating a western Canadian association of Jewish schools, there has been dissatisfaction on both sides during his stay.

Dear Sarah,

I have been in the vehicle-leasing business for 18 years and have always felt that I get the best response from consumers when I advertise in The Canadian Jewish News.

Few weeks or days go by that someone doesn't tell me they got my name from The CJN. When I'm out I also hear "Aren't you in The Canadian Jewish News?"

I've been advertising for the last 12 years in The CJN and feel it has more than paid for itself. I believe that constant advertising in one paper helps people to remember me when they need to lease a vehicle.

I have been advertising in The CJN a long time and will continue to do so for a longer time – God Willing.

Thanks again,

Heather Levitt-Simmons

Vancouver Jewish day school may close

By PETER CAULFIELD
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — The Vancouver Hebrew Academy elementary school will close its doors at the end of this academic year if it is unable to find enough money to cover an operating deficit of $350,000.

Parents with children at the only Orthodox elementary day school in the Lower Mainland reacted to the news by calling an emergency meeting at Schara Tzedeck synagogue.

A steering committee of 10 parents was formed to address "a very complex and sensitive" situation.

According to one parent, the steering committee will remain in existence until a board of directors is established. (The school has not had a board for two years.)

The parent said the steering committee is also preparing a financial plan, and is actively looking for funds.

"We have already managed to raise some money," she noted.

Hebrew Academy principal Shayndel Feuerstein said she would not hesitate to work with a board "as long as it is supportive of the school's mission statement, and it is prepared to work within the framework of the school and not against it."

Vancouver Hebrew Academy, which was established 11 years ago, has approximately 135 students from preschool to Grade seven.

The school is located in rented space in the Lubavitch Centre, adjacent to the Jewish Community Centre of Greater Vancouver in Oakridge.

Dr. Sally Rogow, professor emeritus of the faculty of education at the University of British Columbia, who has two grandchildren attending the school said, "Hebrew Academy is a very happy school. There is a nice atmosphere you immediately feel when you walk through the doors."

Rogow, who has been a volunteer tutor and story-teller at Hebrew Academy said, "Vancouver Hebrew Academy is a child-centred school with high standards of education, individualized programs of instruction, and a teaching staff that is exceptional.

"Many of the children who attend Vancouver Hebrew Academy come from very large families, and not all of them are able to pay the school's full tuition. Because there is a policy not to turn away any child for lack of money, the school has to make up the difference."

Solly Kaplinski, principal of Vancouver Talmud Torah, the largest Jewish elementary day school in the Lower Mainland, said his school would endeavor to accommodate as many of Hebrew Academy's students as it could "if their school should close. I certainly hope, however, that Hebrew Academy doesn't cease operation.

"Jewish parents should have the option to send their children to a school with the curriculum and the atmosphere they want."

Rogow says she hopes that money will be found in time and that the school survives.

"Hebrew Academy is more than just a school, it is an important part of the Jewish community, and it deserves all our support."

Negotiations with Swiss reach 'critical' stage

By DANIEL KURTZMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — As negotiations to settle Holocaust-era claims against Switzerland reach a critical stage, there is no clear indication that efforts to reach an agreement will succeed.

Despite an unofficial June 30 deadline, a key player in the negotiations said there was unlikely to be any agreement soon.

At the same time, the negotiator, Michael Hausfeld, a lawyer representing Holocaust victims, cautioned against both "false hopes" and "undue pessimism."

It is against this backdrop that conflicting reports have emerged about whether Switzerland's three largest private banks have made a firm offer to Jewish negotiators.

One source familiar with the negotiations said the Swiss banks – Union Bank of Switzerland, Credit Suisse and Swiss Bank Corp. – offered a settlement totaling more than $1 billion (US) to resolve claims brought by Holocaust survivors who charge that the banks failed to return their assets after World War II.

The banks denied that an offer had been put forward, as did a reliable source, who characterized the negotiations as "tenuous." Another source said a "chasm" of differences remained between the two sides.

The World Jewish Congress (WJC), lawyers representing Holocaust victims and the Swiss banks have been holding settlement talks in recent weeks under the aegis of the U.S. State Department. The negotiations are being held under rules of strict confidentiality.

The WJC, which has spearheaded international efforts to pressure Switzerland to confront its wartime past, has been pushing Switzerland to reach a global settlement that would resolve all claims stemming from Swiss actions during World War II.

Such a settlement would presumably address the claims being pursued in a multi-billion class-action suit brought by Holocaust survivors.

The banks, however, have so far refused to negotiate any claims not directly related to the banks themselves. And the Swiss government, together with its central bank, the Swiss National Bank, has ruled out using taxpayers' money to pay into any settlement.

"Switzerland will not participate in such settlements," Swiss President Flavio Cotti said last week.

In a move that could increase pressure on the Swiss government to reach a settlement, lawyers representing Holocaust victims are planning to sue the Swiss National Bank for its role in accepting the vast majority of gold looted by the Nazis, including gold stolen directly from Holocaust victims.

The suit was postponed earlier this month amid attempts to first reach a settlement with the private banks.

A spokesperson for the Swiss National Bank, Werner Abegg, said, "We believe that there are no grounds for class action suits against us, and we will use every legal option to defend ourselves from such unjustified claims."

One source said the difference between what some Jewish negotiators are seeking and what the banks are willing to negotiate has further complicated matters.

There are some who feel that if the Swiss National Bank doesn't join in with the other banks in a global resolution, "they don't want any resolution," the source said.

Another source said, however, that such an assessment is "flat-out wrong."

The reported settlement offer from the banks was said to have come just days before the New York State Banking Department decided to approve a merger between Union Bank of Switzerland and Swiss Bank Corp. The U.S. Federal Reserve gave final approval to the deal, which will form the world's third largest bank.

The WJC made no objection to the move, which some took as a sign that progress had been made with Swiss banks toward reaching a settlement of Holocaust-era claims.

On a related front, lawyers involved in the negotiations met this week with an advisory group of Jewish organizations to consult them about the current status of the negotiations.

Like the participants in the settlement talks, those who took part in the advisory group signed strict confidentiality agreements and declined to discuss the meeting.

The June 30 date was set by U.S. public finance officers, who want a progress report on the negotiations to avert the threat of sanctions against the banks.

PM rules out early election, unity gov't

By MICHAL YUDELMAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said last week he has no intention of holding early elections or forming a national unity government.

Netanyahu, expressing confidence that neither the Right nor the Left will cause his government to fall, said that once he reaches a pullback agreement he will persuade all coalition partners, ministers and the public to support it.

"I'm not dealing with coalition considerations at all. I see no reason to hold early elections, I believe this government will survive, and I'm not going to [form] a national unity government," he said.

But opposition leader Ehud Barak, who met Netanyahu for an hour-long briefing last week, said he emerged "at a loss" as to whether a second pullback is in the offing at all.

"It's my impression the prime minister is more concerned with the possibility of losing his seat than with the fate of the peace process," Barak said.

Netanyahu said the second pullback agreement will be the last agreement Israel signs before the final status talks and constitutes the last of its commitments to the Palestinians according to the Oslo accords.

Contrary to prior statements issued by his bureau, Netanyahu said he did not rule out a referendum on the second pullback and was considering it as one of the ways to muster wide public support.

Netanyahu said he did not ask Labor to join a national unity government at his meeting with Barak, noting they did not discuss political issues. He said he had updated Barak on the peace process, just as he updates ministers.

Barak warned that "the more time that passes until the pullback agreement, the more damage it is causing us and Israel's security. Obviously, the obstacles to the peace process are only in the coalition and the right-wing extremists."

Barak said a national unity government is not on the agenda, "because the issue is not the government's composition but its way, and this one is heading for disaster. I will not be part of it."

Amir's friend convicted of failing to prevent shooting

By ELLI WOHLGELERNTER
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Margalit Har-Shefi, a friend of Yitzhak Rabin's assassin Yigal Amir, faces up to two years in prison after she was convicted Sunday of failing to prevent a felony.

Tel Aviv Magistrate's Court Judge Nira Lidski acquitted Har-Shefi of a second charge of helping Amir obtain the means to commit a crime. Sentencing has been set for September 15.

"Only one conclusion can be made from all the evidence, and that is that the defendant knew Yigal Amir was planning to commit a crime, that is to say to murder the prime minister," Lidski said, reading from her 110-page decision.

"She took him seriously, not as a liar indulging in fantasies," she said.

Lidski said there were contradictions in Har-Shefi's testimony, and that it was clear that she was aware of the intention of Amir, a law school classmate at Bar-Ilan University.

Har-Shefi's lawyer, her uncle Yossi Elon, said an appeal is planned.

Elon's brother, MK Benny Elon, defended his niece, saying that "the General Security Service (GSS), whose job it is, did not prevent the murder; the special agent [Avishai Raviv], whom the GSS used to try to prevent the murder, did not prevent it; but this young lady is the one who is meant to have prevented it?"

Leah Rabin called the conviction "one very small ray of light in the very dark world in which we have lived ever since that murder. We expected that she would be convicted, because obviously she was a conspirator and she knew all about his intentions, so she certainly was one part of the machine that was planning this.

Margalit Har-Shefi

"Whether she was the only one I don't know, but all the evidence has proved that she was definitely a part and definitely collaborated and helped him with it," Rabin told Reuters.

Lidski said Amir told Har-Shefi about two occasions in which he set out to kill Rabin but failed, and dismissed Har-Shefi's main line of defense – that Amir appeared to her to be all talk and no action.

The first occasion was on January 22, 1995, when Amir, Har-Shefi, and other activists went to Yad Vashem, where Rabin was supposed to take part in the dedication of a cattle car used by the Nazis. Amir brought his pistol with him and planned to shoot the prime minister, who cancelled the visit due to the Beit Lid bombing that day. Amir told Har-Shefi of his plans on the way home.

Amir then planned to shoot Rabin on September 11, 1995, when he took part in the Kfar Shmaryahu interchange dedication. But by the time Amir arrived, the ceremony was over and Rabin had left. He then told Har-Shefi of his failed attempt, according to evidence presented at the trial.

Har-Shefi showed no emotion as the verdict was read. She sat sketching on a pad, rarely looking up. She refused to answer questions from reporters.

Reform seeks prayer area at Kotel

By HAIM SHAPIRO
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — A group of Reform Jews, who are demanding the right to pray at the Western Wall, were able to come about 100 metres closer on Sunday than they had the week before, but not without another wave of Orthodox criticism.

Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi Yisrael Lau said he was happy the occasion had passed peacefully, but he described the mixed-sex prayer service as nothing more than a demonstration, and said that he hoped in the future everyone would respect the sanctity of the Wall.

Deputy Religious Affairs Minister Arye Gamliel called the event a Reform "provocation" and said that in response the ministry would not participate in a meeting at the Wall scheduled for Monday with the Ne'eman Committee, to consider the allocation of an area for non-Orthodox prayer.

One week earlier when the group of 170 leaders of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations (UAHC) went to pray at the Wall, they were allocated a site next to the southern exit of the Western Wall Plaza, behind a maze of police barriers and several rows of parked cars. On Sunday, the police allowed them to pray closer to the Wall itself, with no parked cars and only a single line of police barriers.

Rabbi Eric Yoffie, president of the UAHC, said following the service that he has nothing but praise for the police and is grateful for what he termed the "slight progress." He said a portion of the Western Wall should be set aside for egalitarian prayer, with men and women praying together.

"All this should not be necessary. The Western Wall is very long. They should set aside one section for egalitarian prayer and another for those who want Orthodox prayer," Yoffie said.

The prayer itself, led by Rabbi Lynn Landsberg of Washington, D.C., to the accompaniment of a guitar, was uneventful, although a small group of haredi youths clustered nearby and passers-by occasionally made derogatory comments.

In another reaction, Betsy Cohen Kallus, a leader of the Women of the Wall, said following the service, that the fact the police could protect the Reform group showed that it could also protect her group if it wanted to. The Women of the Wall, which includes women of all religious streams, holds regular prayers together in the women's section of the Wall, but the police do not allow them to read from the Torah, in order not to anger some haredi worshippers.

June 8

• Nearly 200 lay and rabbinic leaders from the North American Reform movement held a peaceful gathering at the Western Wall. Rabbi Eric Yoffie, president of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, urged the government to prevent passage of any conversion legislation.

June 9

• Media reported that Israel and Lebanon were close to an agreement under which the body of Itamar Ilya, a naval commando killed in a failed operation last September, would be exchanged for several Lebanese prisoners in Israel as well as the bodies of Hamas fighters held by Israel.

June 10

• Pakistan promised Israeli officials that it would not transfer any nuclear technology to Iran, according to Yediot Achronot. The paper said there had been secret contacts between the two countries.

June 11

June 12

• Demographic figures relating to Jerusalem revealed that its Arab population is growing four times faster than the Jewish population and is expected to reach 45 percent of the population in 20 years, up from the present 30 percent. At the end of 1996, Jerusalem's population was 602,100 of whom 421,000 were Jews and 180,900 were Arabs.

Statistics also showed Jerusalem remains the poorest large city in Israel outside Bnei Brak.

50 Years Ago

ON THE FRONT, June 6 – Jewish fighting unity has at long last reached a harmonious operation. Hundreds of new recruits – Haganah, Irgun and Stern Group commandos – reported to a former British military camp near the front line in the Ras el Bin sector. All of the soldiers are now under a unified command within Israel's Defence Army. This is the first Jewish Army in centuries.

Canada donates to peace projects

RAMALLAH — Canada is contributing nearly $600,000 toward several peace initiatives in the Middle East, announced International Co-operation Minister Diane Marleau during a three-day visit to Israel, the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

"Peace is everyone's responsibility, and this includes the active involvement of Israeli and Palestinian communities," said Marleau. "We want to support local initiatives that bring many people together to resolve conflicts, address common problems and build the regional economy."

In addition to announcing the new funding, Marleau witnessed the signing of a joint agreement between Canada and Israel to build a rehabilitation centre for land-mine victims.

The Canada-Israel Regional Rehabilitation Centre, to be built in Africa, will aid land-mine victims financially, socially and medically. The two countries announced the project last year as a way of marking Israel's 50th anniversary.

Among Marleau's ports of call was the peace village of Neve Shalom. The village, which was founded in 1972 by Jews and Arabs of Israeli citizenship, has already received a $25,000 grant from the Canadian Fund for Dialogue and Development, which enabled it to launch several programs to promote understanding and cooperation between Jews and Arabs, especially youth.

Neve Shalom

Recipients of Canadian funding will be:

• The Tel Aviv-based Peres Centre for Peace will receive $72,000 to establish Peace Informatech, an information technology training facility. It will train Palestinian and Israeli students, and provide employment and joint venture opportunities in the private sector.

• The Wi'iam Conflict Resolution Initiative, which promotes dialogue, and supports traditional Arab conflict resolution methods, will receive $200,000. The facility will train volunteers in conflict resolution and address women's issues.

• A further $210,000 will go toward the People's Peace Process, which brings together a wide range of grassroots Israeli and Palestinian groups committed to the peace process. A delegation is expected to visit Canada to advise Canadians on how to support the peace process.

• And $100,000 will go to the Middle East Security and Arms Control Project, which brings together influential regional experts in arms control and regional security. The University of Toronto will lead the project.

All the money comes from the Peacebuilding Fund, which is managed by the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA). It is separate from the $55 million CIDA earmarked in 1994 for the improvement of Palestinians' lives in the autonomous areas.

The Peacebuilding Fund was launched in 1996 as a joint venture between CIDA and the Foreign Affairs department, and has a $20 million endowment over two years.

Marleau also visited the Development Study Centre (DSC) in Rehovot, which will serve as Canada's partner for training and research in the joint land mine project.

Following the signing, she told a group of international students that Queen's University in Kingston will be working with the DSC on the joint land mine effort.

Marleau did not meet any Israeli cabinet ministers but did hold talks with senior Palestinian Authority (PA) officials, including Faisal Husseini.

Husseini said Ottawa should consider suspending trade with Israel and apply economic sanctions in order to pressure Israel on the peace process.

Marleau also visited several CIDA-funded projects in the territories, including the Rafah refugee camp, where, according to media reports, she appeared visibly moved by the squalor. "It's a pity that more Canadians cannot see what I have today," she was quoted as saying.

Accompanying Marleau were two opposition MPs, Gurmant Grewal (Reform) and Louise Hardy (NDP).

With reporting by Ron Csillag in Toronto and Edgar Asher in Jerusalem.

Israel's ultimate survivor

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Two years after assuming office as Israel's youngest prime minister, Benjamin Netanyahu has emerged as the ultimate survivor. Like a cat with nine lives, Netanyahu has survived a series of crises that might have felled a lesser politician.

Mideast Analysis

Even before he was sworn in on June 18, 1996, he deftly manoeuvred his way out of a crisis over the selection of senior cabinet ministers. Before he could catch his breath, rumors swept the country that Israel and Syria were on the cusp of a war. And following the opening of an archeological tunnel exit in eastern Jerusalem, Netanyahu was faced by an unprecedented eruption of Palestinian violence in the territories.

In March 1997, the Palestinians broke off talks with Israel after Netanyahu announced his intention to build Har Choma, a massive housing project in disputed territory in Jerusalem. As a result, Israel's relations with Egypt, Jordan, Morocco, Tunisia and Oman deteriorated. A month later, the Bar-On influence-peddling scandal rocked his government to its foundations.

In September, a botched assassination attempt by the Mossad on the life of Hamas official Khaled Meshal in Amman backfired – bringing Israel's relations with Jordan to the breaking point and prompting Canada to recall its ambassador in Tel Aviv.

In November, Netanyahu's close aide, Avigdor Lieberman, stepped down to defuse a revolt within Likud ranks over plans to abolish party primaries.

At the beginning of 1998, David Levy, the foreign minister, resigned, the third minister since Benny Begin and Dan Meridor to do so, leaving Netanyahu with a razor-thin majority in the Knesset.

And in May, with Netanyahu having rejected as unacceptable Washington's proposal for a 13 percent redeployment from the West Bank, Israel's pivotal relationship with the United States, its only real ally, came under severe strain.

Given his record so far, one might have expected Netanyahu to fare poorly in public opinion polls. For a long while, in fact, he trailed far behind Ehud Barak, the leader of the Labor party. But in the past few months, he has overtaken his arch rival, who is increasingly viewed as ineffectual and vague in his policy pronouncements, and now Netanyahu reportedly has a five to six percent advantage over Barak.

By any yardstick, it is an amazing comeback, particularly in light of Netanyahu's demonization at the hands of the Hebrew press and the widespread perception that, in the words of a British magazine, he is a "serial blunderer."

Despite his current popularity in surveys, Netanyahu has failed to deliver on his election campaign promise of giving Israelis "peace with security."

Peace talks with the Palestinian Authority are in a deep freeze, and negotiations with Syria, severed in early 1996, have not been resumed. Last year, Israel was hit by three suicide bombings that claimed the lives of two dozen civilians. According to the General Security Service, there was a marked increase in the number of terrorist attacks in 1997 as compared to 1996.

Meanwhile, the level of mutual trust between Netanyahu and Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat has sunk so low that they have not met in months. Both remain dependent on American diplomacy to push the peace process, or what is left of it, forward.

The Hebron redeployment in January 1997 remains Netanyahu's sole tangible achievement in peacemaking, but speculation abounds that he may finally be prepared to accept Washington's ideas for a double-digit withdrawal from the West Bank in exchange for concrete Palestinian concessions.

After two years in power, Netanyahu, for whom political survival is paramount, still wavers between two opposing poles: a Zionist Revisionist commitment to the Land of Israel and a pragmatic impulse for compromise. Since he has not established a clear political identity, few Israelis, including most of his cabinet colleagues, lack any notion where he is heading.

Israel seeks proof of Iranian killing

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegrahpic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israel is seeking clarification regarding reports that Iran executed a Jewish community leader in Tehran.

Deputy Defence Minister Silvan Shalom, answering questions in the Knesset last week, said Israel had appealed to the Red Cross, the United Nations and other international organizations to verify what happened, and what has happened to other Jews who have been arrested in Iran.

Shalom's remarks followed recent reports that a 60-year-old activist in the Jewish community in Tehran had been hung, reportedly because of his ties with Israel and his efforts to help Iranian Jews emigrate.

According to the reports, the man had disappeared a month ago. Two weeks ago, Iranian authorities reportedly informed the family that he had been executed without explaining why.

The man's brother was quoted as saying that he had been killed because of his activism in the Jewish community. According to reports, some 13 Jews have been executed in Iran since the Islamic revolution in 1979. Over 10,000 Jews are estimated to live in Iran.

For safe sun, visit Deck & Dock

Now summer's here, you'll be soaking up some safe sun — and thinking about lawn and patio furniture, especially sunbrellas. For the best outdoor furniture and accessories from around the world, visit Deck and Dock.

The sunbrella selection is vast and varied. There are patio and market-style pulley models, patio styles with side flaps, and cafe models with push-up shafts. The aluminum market-style pole has a crank tilt; and you can tilt one wood pole model by grasping a corner of the shade and walking around it.

There are cantilevered sunbrellas which rotate 360°, tilt to 45° to adjust to the direction of sunlight, and comfortably shade a large table or three chaises. For a fun look, better venting and rain protection, try a two-tier umbrella.

Deck & Dock specializes in fade-proof sunbrella fabrics and dyes, UV protected for 1,600-2,300 hours; most fabrics are strong acrylics with vivid designer colors. New this year are more subtly shaded linens.

In Deck & Dock's garden-like environment, skylights admit natural light to help you choose colours and materials. Coffee's always on and well-trained staff offer you their experience and in-depth knowledge.

Deck & Dock's two Toronto locations are 1280 Castlefield Ave., 416-781-4887; and 7775 Yonge St. at Centre St. in Thornhill, 905-763-0910. For information on the Port Carling store, call Dave Reburn at Castlefield.

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The 10th annual Jewish Book Awards at the Leah Posluns Theatre recently honored 13 Canadian books on Jewish themes, with prizes in 12 categories. Cheques totalling a record $6,250 were awarded — although a modest sum, it was still much improved over the annual $500 with which the awards first started.

The Martin and Beatrice Fischer Prize for Fiction went to Regine Robin for her book The Wanderer, which had previously won a Governor General's Award in its original French version and was recently translated into English.

The book tells the story of a French-speaking Jewish woman who tries to fit into Montreal society but is haunted by memories of the Holocaust and other difficulties. Robin, who was not present to accept the award, is herself a French-born writer who lives in Montreal.

One way or another, the Holocaust was the predominant literary theme of the evening, so it seems appropriate that the awards are sponsored by the Koffler Centre of the Arts with assistance from the Holocaust Education & Memorial Centre of Toronto. The program featured three categories of prizes relating to the Holocaust.

The Canadian Society for Yad Vashem Award for Holocaust History went to Isabel Vincent for Hitler's Silent Partners, her book on the Swiss banking scandal involving Nazi gold; the Dorothy Shoichet President's Award for Holocaust Literature went to Roma Karsh for her novel Endless; and the Elie Wiesel Prize in Holocaust Memoir was shared by Elaine Kalman Naves for Journey to Vaja and Vera Schiff for Theresienstadt.

Another Holocaust-related book, How Silent Were The Churches by Alan Davies and Marilyn Nefsky, won the Joseph and Faye Tanenbaum Award for Canadian Jewish History. Meanwhile, the Rachel Bessin/Isaac Frischwasser Memorial Award for Young Adult Fiction went to Carol Matas for The Garden, which centers on the experiences of several young people in the immediate post-Holocaust era and during the founding of the Jewish state.

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Though the politics surrounding her execution remain murky, the idealism of pioneer, poet and martyr Hannah Senesh shines through like a beacon.

This is true of the life of the Hungarian heroine as well as of the production of Hannah by the late Toronto playwright Eleanor Siminovitch, at the Bloor Jewish Community Centre (Bloor JCC).

Hannah made history in two ways for its sponsors, the Jewish Theatre Committee and Bloor JCC. It was the first full production of one of the committee's prize winning plays, and Hannah itself was the first prize winner 10 years ago.

Directed by Sylvia Lennick, Hannah is based on the diaries and letters of the young Hungarian, who after working on a kibbutz in Palestine, parachuted behind enemy lines in World War II to reach her homeland, in an attempt to save Jews from deportation by the Nazis.

Hannah is played by 18-year-old Lauren Cash, whose youthful energy and idealism suit the character well in Act 1, but she fails to capture the maturity and dedication of the older heroine as she goes to her death rather than reveal her secret British army code.

Hannah is a difficult role because that kind of idealism does not

CANTORS ENTERTAIN AT BETH DAVID B'NAI ISRAEL BETH AM

Shaarei Shomayim celebrates Israel's 50th

By DOROTHY LICHTBLAU
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Four well-known cantors presented a program of familiar and well-loved songs at a recent concert that marked the inauguration of annual cantorial concerts at the Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue and commemorated Israel's 50th anniversary.

Two of the singers, Yaakov Motzen and Shlomo Simcha Sufrin are respectively the cantor and chazzan sheini at the Shaarei Shomayim. The others were cantors Alberto Mizrahi, chazzan at the Anshe Emet Synagogue in Chicago, and Shlomo Miller, who has performed in concert in North America, Europe and Israel.

Motzen, a native of Tel Aviv, started the evening with Ata Nigeleta by Genchoff. His polished stage presence and full-bodied voice suited both light and more complex musical fare. And, in duos or trios with Mizrahi, Miller and Sufrin, he displayed his able musicianship.

In Israel, Motzen studied music with Yosef Goland and chazzanut with Cantor Yitzchak Eshel. Already an established professional, Motzen came to Canada in 1978. In the intervening years, he has given concerts in numerous countries as well as served as the cantor of Shomrim Laboker-Beth Yehuda and later of Adath Israel Poale Zedek congregations, both in Montreal.

Each cantor demonstrated a clearly individual form, but solo or blended, the voices were powerful and effective.

Mizrachi's style was suave and earthy. His evocative medley of Ladino songs was lively and delivered in deliciously rich tones. The selection added to the diversity of the evening. A Greek-born tenor, Mizrahi studied with cantors David Koussevitzky and Moshe Ganchoff and has performed in nine languages in recital halls around the world.

Kharhutz Mechomer by Lov was one of the songs offered by Miller, whose performance was strong, confident and technically proficient. A vocalist from the age of five, he received his basic training in chazzanut from his father, Rabbi Aaron Miller, and later studied with teachers in Canada, the United States and Israel.

Two Shlomo Carlebach songs, Moishe v'Ahaaron and Mizmor l'Dovid were joyfully sung by Sufrin. These and the Green/Fried melody Nisht Dedaiget, Yiden added variety to the program.

A young man who has devoted himself to bringing religious Jewish music to stage, radio and home entertainment systems, Sufrin delivers his music with heart-felt soul. Three of his albums are That Special Melody, Tehillim and the latest, Aish.

The performers sang an opera medley that was entertaining and playful, and Miller, Mizrahi and Motzen presented a lively rendition of Moishe Oysher tunes.

The cantors were supported by the Shaarei Shomayim Choir as the evening ended with variations of Adon Olam.

The overall success of the evening was enhanced by the accompaniment of Daniel Gildar and the back up voices provided by the choir.

exist in the world any more, says committee chair Ralph Wintrob.

As Hannah's roommate, Malka, in the kibbutz, Lisa Rothman gives an excellent performance as does Howard Davis as the Hungarian officer who accuses Hannah of treason against Hungary and hounds her to death.

As Hannah's mother, Fran Elliott gives a subdued and professional rendering, but staging limitations require her to act in the background. David Wand as Itzhak, Hannah's companion behind the lines, is effective, as is John Barker as the Nazi interrogator.

Trudy Deacon, as the Hungarian prison guard who admired Hannah's selflessness, takes full advantage of the ambivalent role she plays.

Wintrob says the committee hopes for a wider audience when it stages its next play in the new theatre being built at the Bloor JCC.

Canadian Jewish books honored

Rosalie Sharp, Irving Abella and Edwin Goodman, who jointly edited the book of memoirs by Canadian Jews entitled Growing Up Jewish, shared the Louis Lockshin Memorial Award for Memoir/Biography. Jeffrey Sharp, in accepting the award for his mother, divulged that the book had earned more than $100,000 in sales to benefit the Ashkenaz Festival of New Yiddish Culture.

The Betty and Morris Aaron Prize for Scholarship on a Canadian Subject went to Elizabeth Greene for We Who Can Fly, a celebration of writer Adele Wiseman's life and achievements. The Morris Winemaker Prize in LiteraryCriticism went to Norman Ravvin for A House of Words, which is in part a study of Canadian and American Holocaust fiction.

Martin Lockshin, author of Rashbam's Commentary on Exodus, took away the Penina Rubinoff Memorial Award for Biblical Scholarship, while Simcha Simchovitch won the Izzy and Betty Kirshenbaum Foundation Prize in Yiddish for his book of poetry Funken in Zhar (Sparks in Embers). Finally, Carol Rose won the Henry Fuerstenberg Award for Poetry for her collection, Behind The Blue Gate.

During the reception afterwards, Adam Fuerstenberg, chairperson of the awards committee, told The CJN that the committee received an unprecedented 40 titles for consideration and that the main function of the awards is to give writers some much-needed attention and recognition. "As you know, writing is the loneliest job there is," he said. "It's like being a lighthouse operator."

For Prof. Irving Abella, who gave a reading during the program (another was given by Madame Justice Rosalie Silberman Abella), the evening symbolized "the coming of age of Jewish culture in Canada and the recognition that the literature here has reached the level of Jewish literature anywhere in the world."

"There is an amazing amount of productivity in our community in terms of keeping Canadian Jewish culture alive," said historian Paula Draper. "Personally, I'm thrilled to see the level of interest in preserving the stories of Holocaust survivors."

"Our writers and poets are important interpretors of the Jewish life and culture in Canada, so I think that any recognition they get is extremely worthwhile," said Jay Brodbar, director of community planning for UJA Federation.

TRAVEL TALK

BY BILL GLADSTONE

VINTAGE SAILING SHIP IS A CANADIAN ICON

Prominently moored in Halifax harbour, Nova Scotia's famous goodwill ambassador, the Bluenose II schooner, was recently treated to a $500,000 refitting according to Wilfred Moore, chairman of the Bluenose II Preservation Trust.

Immortalized on the Canadian dime, the original Bluenose was the fastest fishing vessel of its kind in its day. Built in Lunenburg in 1921, she was a working fishing vessel that competed in international boat races after each fishing season. Once in a rare while she lost individual races but she never lost a series of races, and carried the International Fisherman's Cup back to Lunenburg for 17 consecutive years until 1938, the last year the contest was held.

Although the Bluenose was the pride of Lunenburg and the glory of Nova Scotia, the ship spent her last years toiling in relative obscurity. Sold to the West Indies Trading Company in 1942, she carried cargo around the Caribbean and southern United States until she struck a reef off Haiti and sank in 1946.

An icon of the halcyon days of sailing ships, the Bluenose is also a reminder of the bygone era when ships would return from the bountiful ocean with holds full of fish. Bluenose II, built in 1963 as a replica of the original, has been enlisted as a promotional tool for provincial tourism and has visited many Canadian and American ports.

Sailing aboard the Bluenose II is a memorable experience. Passengers must make sure they are out of the way when the crew hops about the deck, adjusting the sails, ropes and booms according to the captain's orders. "To be on board the Bluenose II under sail is such an overwhelming feeling that any other boat is like a dinghy," says Moore. "It's her lines, it's her shape, it's her speed, it's the way she cuts through the water so effortlessly. She's simply majestic."

If the present ship is a good facsimile of the original, the ship's new captain, Wayne Angus Walters, is likewise a reasonable facsimile of the Bluenose's legendary first skipper, Angus Walters, his grandfather. "I don't look at it as following in his footsteps because he was a fisherman and I'm a deep-sea-going person," said Walters. "His vessel was a fishing vessel and this is just a replica."

Surprisingly, Walters did not hear countless sea stories as a child on his grandfather's knee. "My grandfather never really wanted to make fishing for a living sound attractive to me because it was a hard way to make a living. All the stuff about the Bluenose was documented in books, and it was in school that I read about it. He preferred that I not be attracted to the sea, so he didn't tell me any great stories.

"I inherited his stubborn streak and went to sea anyway, but in a slightly different way. Instead of fishing, I went to the deep sea on cargo ships, research vessels, and bulk carriers that took me around the world."

The Bluenose II is very fast, Walters concedes, but is it as fast as the original? "You can't tell because you'd have to put them side by side under the same conditions. So there's no way we'll ever know if one is faster than the other."

Bluenose II's home is a dock in Lunenburg, where it rests between voyages. On occasion, it is moored at the wharf by Privateer's Warehouse in the historic properties section of Halifax. Usually when the vessel is in port, the public is invited to step aboard at dockside for free, or buy tickets for two-hour harbour cruises.

An evening of Heart and Soul

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Popular Jewish music star Avraham Fried will headline Heart and Soul: an evening of Jewish music and song, at the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts, June 24, 7:30 p.m.

The program is sponsored by Chabad Lubavitch of Markham, a congregation of over 250 families in the Bayview-Green Lane area of Thornhill.

Also performing will be Cantor Ari Klein, the Toronto Jewish Male Choir and the Nafshenu Orchestra.

Fried sings in Hebrew, Yiddish and English, and has released numerous top-selling albums. Based in New York, he has performed internationally.

Klein, a native of Montreal, has held positions in Montreal, New York, and Johannesburg. He is now chazzan of the Park East synagogue in New York. A media release describes his technique as "a blend of the traditional cantorial liturgical music of (Yossele) Rosenblatt and (Moishe) Koussevitzky."

The Toronto Jewish Male Choir is the successor of the Thornhill Jewish male choir, which sang at Friday evening, holiday and High Holy Day services at Chabad Lubavitch of Markham. Although composed entirely of amateur singers, it has given several very well-received concert performances.

For more information, or for tickets, call Faye Rewald, 905-709-2372.

FACE OF EMOTION

Emotion is written on the face of a singer, above, at a Lisbon fado club. The traditional Portuguese music dealing with love and loss is popular among tourists and locals. The last International Expo of the millennium opened in Lisbon May 22, and runs until Sept. 30. [Frances Kraft photo]

Time to shape up before you tee off

By BEVERLEY BURDEYNEY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Now that spring is well upon us, golfers are returning to their favorite sport with all the hopes and dreams they nurtured during the winter.

Those dreams include smoother swings, longer drives, fewer putts and lower scores. But unless golfers include fitness in their plans, with specifically tailored exercises to address golf's demands, their dreams could turn into nightmares. Injuries and golf go together for the player who is not fit.

There is a remedy: a "Fitness for Golf" exercise program designed specifically for golfers.

The idea of the program is to incorporate a series of exercises designed to improve flexibility and strength. As golfers get older, strength and flexibility diminish unless something is done to counter the process. An exercise program, in addition to enhancing fitness, can provide golfers with the best chance of reaching their potential and lowering their scores.

Unlike its popular image, those who have golfed for any length of time realize golf is a physical sport that can result in injuries. A golfer is particularly vulnerable in his or her back, regardless of age. Golfers are notorious for suffering back problems – and not only because they may not be swinging properly. The back simply is not built to take the strains and stresses of the golf swing.

Physical fitness can help produce a smooth swing

Nevertheless, the back can be strengthened and made more supple so it can withstand the swing's rotational forces. A safe, effective program can be devised that does not include trips to the gym or using heavy equipment. There is no point in taking on a program that is inconvenient or that requires a lot of time. After all, you could use that time for golf!

For best results, the program should be followed three to four times a week for at least 20 minutes a session. All the better if you can supplement it with walking or swimming.

The Fitness for Golf program is directed specifically at improving the body's alignment and structure. It utilizes the pelvic tilt, the key movement in the program. The pelvic tilt strengthens all the key muscles – front (abdomen), lower back, and side to side (hips and pelvic area).

The pelvic tilt is the big secret behind getting the best muscle workout. It not only unites the upper and lower halves of the body but it helps maintain balance and alignment while engaging all of the muscles cooperatively and efficiently.

The pelvic area can be compared to the foundation of a house. If the foundation is strong and solid, then the building will be stable. Every golfer has heard that posture and address are keys to better golf. In that vein, the pelvic tilt will provide a much better chance of maintaining proper spine angle – the posture at address – throughout the swing.

The result will be more consistent shooting, without bobbing up and down or side to side during the swing.

There are 10 basic exercises based on the pelvic tilt that will increase the body's strength, balance, flexibility and range of motion and enhance the transfer of energy through the club shaft and club head to the ball. A more controlled, powerful swing will result with less chance of injury or strain. You will be fit for golf.

Allow your exercise program to become part of your life. Be sure to take enough time to warm up before every round. Tour pros stretch, so should you.

The result can be long term gains, not short term "miracles" that rarely last. Golf is a sport for a lifetime. Accept the challenge and improve over the long term, the only term that really matters.

McGill U launches new Middle East Program

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Israeli, Jordanian and Palestinian graduate social work students will spend a year studying together at McGill University, under a program that will receive up to $3 million over the next three years from the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA).

A total of 36 students, equally divided between the three groups, are expected to take part in the coming five years in McGill's new Middle East Program in Civil Society and Peace Building. As the name suggests, the program's long-term goals are far loftier than providing these students with an opportunity to advance their education abroad.

They will be expected to return to their homelands for the second year of their fellowship as "ambassadors" for peace, models of constructive coexistence, schooled in the most modern methods of promoting social justice, who have shown that Arabs and Jews can work together on common concerns.

The additional government money, announced recently by Minister for International Cooperation Diane Marleau, will enable the program to expand to include students from the Palestinian Authority and lay the foundation for ongoing trilateral contact in the Middle East.

This year's inaugural Fellows were two Jordanians and three Israelis, including a Bedouin. They ranged in age from the 20s to 50s.

Four are returning to their countries where they will be expected to apply what they have learned. (The fifth is staying on to complete a PhD.)

While each followed their own course of study, they all participated in a year-long interdisciplinary seminar entitled Civil Society, Inequality and Peace Building, which reflects program founder Jim Torczyner's belief that when a country combats poverty and safeguards social rights, it is in a better position to seek peace with its neighbors.

"This program has created an opportunity and a gate for people who do not often get a chance to meet with each other, to study and work together, to learn about one another, and to share ideas, knowledge and hope," said Noga Porat, a community organizer at a grassroots agency in Jerusalem modeled on Project Genesis in Montreal, founded and brought to Israel six years ago by Torczyner, a social work professor.

Feminists

"This program has given me the opportunity to learn about the lives of people who live so close to me, but yet are so far away. It has given me a chance to learn about our commonalities instead of our differences, and about social problems that we are all concerned with," said Porat.

Amal El-Sana, a Bedouin from the Negev Desert and first female university graduate of her community, said she hopes to make use of what she learned here about women's rights and community advocacy among her people.

Away from home for the first time in her 25 years, she said, "The process that we went through this year as a group from Jordan and Israel was very fascinating and exciting for me. I felt that I was a bridge between the Jordanians and the Israelis. Being an Arab from Israel, I belong and identify with both groups.

"It is great to see how we are now working together as one group, that we share the same feelings and concerns about peace in the Middle East."

Both feminists, Porat and El-Sana dream of one day opening a shelter for Jewish and Arab women.

The two Jordanians, Hmoud Al-Olimat and Mohammad Maani, are professors at the University of Jordan (UofJ). Following the Israel-Jordan peace treaty, Torczyner was instrumental in having McGill sign an agreement in 1996 with the UofJ to help develop a graduate school of social work, the first in the Arab world.

The fifth fellow, New York-born Merav Moshe, is director of field work at Ben-Gurion University's social work school and a key organizer of Genesis in Israel.

Torczyner said a strong bond developed between the group. "You have become a powerful metaphor for what is possible and I am convinced you will spread that message back home next year," he said at the closing ceremony.

Next year's program will expand to include the school of architecture for the study of low-cost housing, a common concern in the region.

The program will grow in other ways in the Middle East. Practice and research centres are to be established with institutional partners in Israel, Jordan and the Palestinian Authority, where returning Fellows will put into practice what they have learned in the areas of social welfare and human rights. These centres will also enable linkages between the three and McGill.

The centres will also oversee other new aspects of the McGill program: academic exchange and a seminar and publication series on peace and social development (including a Web site).

"Senior academic leaders in Israel, Jordan and the Palestinian Authority have agreed already to sit together and serve on an executive committee and provide policy direction to the program," Torczyner said.

In announcing the CIDA funding, Marleau said the McGill program's emphasis on basic human needs are consistent with Canada's current assistance to the West Bank and Gaza.

"The project is inclusive; Palestinians, Jordanians and Israelis will all participate equally...[It] encourages communication and cooperation between governments, academics and non-governmental organizations in the areas of housing and social work...This project has the potential to make an important contribution to the cause of peace in the Middle East."

She said she hopes Canada's contribution will "serve as a catalyst to mobilize further financial support from those who have a stake in the outcome – and they are many.

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

NEW YORK — From May 26th to May 29th, the Jewish Student Press Service in New York held its annual spring conference for Jewish student journalists.

Students from across the States as well as eight Canadians attended. It was an opportunity for students to listen to, and interact with members of the professional Jewish media.

In attendance this year were three writers from Images (Toronto's Jewish student newspaper), three editors from Montreal's the Hillel Hub, as well as the editor of University of Western Ontario's news-bulletin Lifeline.

The seminars and workshops covered a variety of subjects. One panel featured a former writer from New York's the Village Voice, and also featured the former editor (Jennifer Bleyer) of a Jewish-punk magazine called Mazeltov Cocktail. Her reasons for starting the magazine were that, "a lot of Jews feel 'excommunicated' from the established campus scene. This offers an alternative model to express their Judaism in a university mode."

Mazeltov Cocktail contained articles such as Bar-Mitzvahs gone awry, and others on topics such as a Yiddish-speaking punker, Jewish punks in the military, and an interview with a Chasidic Rabbi punk-rocker. The editor of Mazeltov Cocktail also informed us of another seemingly obscure publication — a Lubavitch Surfer's magazine. A regular column in that magazine relates the parsha of the week to a part of the ocean that the writer has surfed.

Lester Friedman, professor at Syracuse University, gave a lecture called, Is American Jewish Cinema Dying? on the small number of Jews in modern movies. The films in the past twenty years with visible Jewish characters, he explained, were made by the same handful of baby-boomer Jewish directors. According to Friedman, Hollywood will soon run low on Jewish directors if the stock isn't rebuilt with younger talent.

J.J. Goldberg from the Jewish Week in New York addressed the participants on the politics of U.S.-Israel relations. An interesting fact he related was that U.S. aid to Israel is one quarter of the total foreign aid spending.

Lisa Hostein, editor of the Jewish Telegraphic Agency, posed the question: what makes Jewish news? She used the example of Monica Lewinsky as a case study, and whether or not one should consider her a "Jewish" story because she's Jewish. This type of controversy has carried over to many student publications. Sometimes editorial boards are hard-pressed to find answers as to whether something ought to be in print with remote Jewish content.

The complexities of editorial decision-making continued with a hands-on workshop. Sam Apple, editor of New Voices in New York, led a workshop on editing submissions for style and brevity. As a group, we were challenged to tighten a 400-word paragraph to the smallest possible word count. The winner skimmed it to 84.

Letty Cottin Pogrebin ,former editor of Ms. magazine, answered questions about student activism, and later the group had an opportunity to shmooze with other writers and editors on the last night of the conference at the closing dinner. Guests included Orthodox feminist writer Blu Greenberg, Gary Rosenblatt, editor of New York's Jewish Week, Sam Norich, editor of Forward, Robin Cemalest, editor of Artnews (the longest running art magazine in the US), and David Twersky, editor of New Jersey Jewish News.

Like last year's conference, it was a terrific networking experience, and a chance to learn new skills as an editor and writer.

But in a June 5 letter to attorneys involved in the class action suit, Toronto and New York lawyers Sergio Karas and Richard Crisona raise serious objections to the proposed out-of-court settlement.

They claim that the structure of the proposed offer would "betray" the interests of Holocaust victims because it would award a large portion of the recovered funds to individuals rather than depositors or their heirs.

The banks have reportedly offered $1.6 billion, with some $600 million, or nearly 40 percent, intended mainly for indigent Holocaust survivors, including those who had no deposits in Swiss banks.

(According to the June 5 edition of the Forward, the World Jewish Congress has agreed to a settlement of about $3 billion.)

Karas and Crisona argue that the offer violates the terms of reference of the litigation, since the depositors would be prevented from gaining access to "a large portion of the settlement."

The pair seek assurances that the interests of the depositors will be protected so as "to maximize their recovery," and that the World Jewish Congress will not establish a philanthropic fund with money intended exclusively for "the benefit of depositors and their heirs."

Crisona and Karas, who represents some 20 clients in Toronto, maintain that they are not trying to undermine the ongoing talks between the banks and the World Jewish Congress.

The negotiations, which reportedly face a June 30 deadline, are taking place in strict confidentiality under the sponsorship of the U.S. State Department.

"...our clients do not necessarily want to intervene, or to derail the overall settlement of the litigation," writes Crisona, whose firm represents Karas & Associates in New York City.

"They do, however, need some assurance that their interests are being adequately protected, and that their representatives are not foregoing maximizing the class recoveries in order to establish a philanthropic fund that has no legitimate place in the settlement of these consolidated lawsuits."

Karas and Crisona are still awaiting a reply to their letter.

It's a three-peat! CHAT rules softball diamond

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The CHAT Tigers are number one in softball again — for the third year in a row — as the boys in pinstripes steamrollered the opposition in last week's championship game in TDCAA small schools competition.

CHAT earned the coveted "three-peat" with a smothering 15-4 victory over Mary Ward to cap a perfect 15-0 season, including playoffs. CHAT took an early 3-0 lead and never looked back as they hammered Mary Ward's pitchers with hit after hit in virtually every inning of the seven-inning affair.

On the mound, CHAT pitcher Josh Colomby shut the door on Mary Ward, scattering hits and never allowing the Catholic school to mount a big inning. It was his 27th straight win for the Tigers. CHAT has lost only two games — when Colomby was absent — since the hard-throwing hurler came on in relief in the championship game two years ago and helped the Tigers pull off a win.

CHAT's defence was nearly flawless in the championship game, as they snagged several potentially dangerous line drives while turning over key double plays to snuff out any chance of a Mary Ward rally. The last out of the game came on a nifty double.

Though Mary Ward gave CHAT the most trouble during the regular season, they served as meat for the grinder during the championship game. CHAT had more trouble on its march to the title in the quarter-final and semi-final games, when they fell behind in the first innings of both games, 4-0 and 6-0 respectively.

"I think it's really character," he said. "They know if they get down, they can get back.

"I see a lot of teams that get down and start kicking the dirt. They fold their tents. This team has a lot of character. They don't give up. They've come back in the past."

Fishbaum believes the 1998 edition of the Tigers is technically very sound and it's the best-hitting of the three championship teams he's coached. Despite racking up 15 runs against Mary Ward, "our big hitters didn't hit very strong today," he said.

Catcher Nathaniel Lipkus, 18, agreed that CHAT has had the power to rally from early deficits. This year's final was fairly routine compared to last year's championship, when CHAT had to go to extra innings to win the title, he pointed out.

Centre-fielder Jason Wang, who scored three home-runs in the final game, attributed the Tigers' success to "a total team effort." A back up on last year's team, Wang said CHAT picked up the intensity for the championship game and played error-free ball.

Shortstop Ryan Yermus, 17, pointed to great team chemistry as a key factor in the win and in the semi-final comeback. Despite falling behind 6-0, the Tigers came back for a 14-7 win, he said.

The Tigers' full roster includes: Daniel Warner, Jeff Moscoe, Daniel Kobrossi, Michael Tweyman, David Safer, Jacob Rifkind, Ronen Maze, Jared Faust, Jeff Niman, Jack Latner, Josh Waks, Jeff Hershenfield, Daniel Lipton, Jared Rochwerg, Colomby, Wang, Lipkus and Yermus. Corey Birnbaum served as an assistant to Fishbaum.

Y honors handball star

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Rebecca Hoffer, a member of Canada's National Handball Team, was awarded the Max Nusgart Memorial Award at the 26th annual Y Sports Dinner on June 8. The award is presented yearly to the Manitoba Jewish Athlete of the Year.

Hoffer, one of only two team members from outside Quebec, has been a national team member since 1996. The team won silver medals last year at the Pan American Championships in Brazil and at the Sportia Cup in Montreal.

In the fall, Hoffer will begin training with the team for the 1999 Pan Am Games, scheduled to be held in Winnipeg next summer.

In winning the Nusgart Award, Hoffer was chosen over six other contestants including last year's winner, 17-year-old judo champion Olia Berger, and 16-year-old Aaron Pfeffer, also a judo champion who was also nominated last year. The other nominees were rhythmic gymnast Mira Lecker, 11; gymnast Leah Dlot, 15; baseball player Sean Kravetsky, 14; and cyclist and weightlifter Riva Benditt.

Another highlight of the evening was the presentation of the Rose and Max Rady Jewish Community Centre 1998 Recognition Award to Earl and Cheryl Barish, the principals behind the International Basketball Association and its Winnipeg entry, the Cyclones.

The keynote speaker for the evening was Marv Levy, former head coach of the defunct Montreal Alouettes of the Canadian Football League, who also enjoyed a successful coaching career in the NFL.

The annual event attracted 900 people this year, according to dinner chair Ken Kronson. The funds raised go toward supporting athletic programming at the Rady Centre.

Israel over Russia

MOSCOW — Israel has defeated Russia – in chess, that is.

World chess champion Gary Kasparov coached the Tel Aviv team in the match, which was dedicated to the Jewish state's 50th anniversary.

Among those who played for Russia were a member of the country's parliament and Russia's chief rabbi, who lost his two games.

The Inside Back

Schlepp me out to the ball game

By JORDAN MAX

Last Laugh

I suppose it had to happen sooner or later; eventually I would be called upon to publicly assume my fatherly duties in an ancient tribal ritual dating back to the beginning of time.

No, I'm not talking about a brit milah (past that) or bar mitzvah tutoring (not there yet), but something almost as monumental, namely baseball league.

My sons, ages 7 and 5, had been looking forward to the day when they could finally assume their rightful place in the universe, assuming they could actually fit into their uniforms first. Never mind that the kids can't pronounce the name of their team's sponsor; it's nearly impossible to come up with a cheer that rhymes with Part-Time Controllers. They just give me that quizzical look. Hey, I tell them, it could be worse, they could be the Viagra Hydraulics. No, scratch that idea...

Now, this may sound sacrilegious to some, but baseball is actually the third most boring spectator sport around, surpassed only by snooker and chess. It certainly leaves lots of time to let your mind wander. Somehow, though, when it's your own child participating, it's almost riveting, even if you're watching as much for injury as for hits or plays made.

As the weeks go by, I rush home from work (three times a week – gevalt!) to gulp some dinner (if there's time) and take one of the boys off to their destination. Mind you, it does prevent me from staying too late at the office.

It takes something to kvell about to realize just how much of our own egos are potentially bound up in our children's abilities and performance. This really isn't about baseball anymore; instead it's a defining moment of revelation about my capacity as a modern-day parent. At the start, I was rightfully nervous about their debut, because it would illustrate my ultimate success or failure as a father, in full public view.

Despite all other nurturing, teaching, role modeling, and disciplining in numerous other areas over the years, what it would ultimately boil down to was my ability to teach these boys to catch, throw and hit a little softball, and run to the general vicinity of the bases.

I wondered as well, would I, when faced with the prospect of public celebration or humiliation, become one of those otherwise mild-mannered people who metamorphosized into the loud, boorish, overprotective, I-know-how-to-coach-better-than-this-schlemiel sports parent, or could I somehow disassociate my own ego and anxieties from my children's abilities, successes and failures?

I was pleased to discover that my instinctual reaction was the latter, that is, at least until the first time my kid would get thrown out sliding into home plate.

By the time of the first game, it was immediately apparent that I had not done a good enough job preparing my sons for baseball. I instinctively wanted to intervene, but somehow restrained myself and let the coaches take care of it.

Come to think of it, it might have had something to do with discovering that the majority of their peers was equally unprepared. It was a close game, 13-12. Well, okay, not really that close. At these ages, any hit is pretty much an automatic home run. The only outs come from strike outs. My boys, no, they're not baseball superstars yet, far from it. But at least they made the effort, not just for themselves, but also for the team, and of course, for the honor of its sponsor with the unpronounceable name.

So I've now settled into the pattern of being a baseball dad. Sure, I still wince at their errors, and make mental notes to work with each of them on this skill or that. I still cheer their performance, good or bad, and actually manage to enjoy watching the game. But I now realize it's not only the game I'm watching unfold, it's also their own development, their self-confidence, in facing new challenges, successes and, yes, failures. So play ball, boys. And to all you dads out there, wherever you are, a happy Father's Day, too.

About jobs

Dear Readers,

This will be the last time this column is published. So the topic for this week is change.

Change is a force that drives us all. One place where we have noted a great deal of change is in the world of work. I have spoken of it in this space many times over the years.

One of the most drastic times we notice change is when we lose our job. When I began writing this column, the unemployment rate was high. People were afraid. They needed to know how to cope with their feelings and how to find new jobs. They needed to assess what skills they had that could be transferred to other workplaces, and how much money they needed to earn in order to support themselves and their families.

Computers became a more important part of the workplace and changed or even eliminated many jobs. New graduates were eager to work, and many employers hired them at rates that were lower than acceptable to older, more experienced workers. Many people returned to school. The growth in adult education was immense. I applauded it.

I myself returned to school. After developing and teaching courses on job-finding and stress management, I wanted to learn more about the principles of teaching and learning. I wanted to increase my knowledge of counselling techniques that I had begun to use in my private practice.

This spring, I am graduating from both master of education and bachelor of education programs. I have learned many new ideas and wrote a thesis that contributed to the field of career education. I have also increased my personal knowledge and skill in helping others learn. Finally, I have made myself marketable in the field of teaching.

Many of you will also be graduating from colleges and universities this spring. Some of you will be completing certificate and other training programs. To all of you I wish the very best of luck. I firmly believe that we will embrace the future successfully.

The world of work has been changing and we have proven that we are willing to change along with it. Continued learning will be the common requirement, if we are to be successful into the next millennium.

Reform Jewry revisits descent policy

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Reform movement's controversial patrilineal descent policy, adopted 15 years ago, may become clearer with the acceptance of specific guidelines, to be established at the conference of the Central Conference of American Rabbis (CCAR) being held this week in Anaheim, Calif.

Conference in California may clarify patrilineal descent rules

"The changes will move the Reform in the United States closer to the position in Canada," said Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, director of Kolel, Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning.

She is the only Canadian on an 11-member rabbinical task force created two years ago. Its report recommends the use of "clear guidelines" for the policy, and that the term patrilineal descent be renamed equilineal descent or Jewish descent.

"My sense is that the report will not change the situation in Canada," said Rabbi Paul Gollom, director, Canadian Council for Reform Judaism.

The report will be discussed at the next meeting of the Canadian section of the CCAR in September.

The practices in Toronto, home to the largest number of Reform Jews in Canada, will not be changed to any great effect, according to

Facelift for 'Gold Rush' cemetery

By PETER CAULFIELD
Pacific Correspondent

DAWSON CITY — To celebrate the 100th anniversary of the Klondike gold rush, the Jewish Historical Society of Yukon has embarked on an unusual centennial project: repairing and re-dedicating the Dawson City Jewish cemetery.

Society president and co-founder Howard Kushner said that, when the gold rush was in full swing, there were close to 200 Jews living – and dying – in and around Dawson City.

"At the turn of the last century, Dawson City had 40,000 inhabitants, making it the largest city in North America west of Winnipeg and north of San Francisco," Kushner said. (The population of Dawson City today is just 1,500.)

In 1902, the Dawson City Jewish Society petitioned the Canadian government for an allotment of land on the "cemetery ridge" overlooking the gold rush boom town. The society's petition was successful, and Beth Chaim Cemetery, under the direction of Rabbi Robert Bloom, soon opened for business. As the gold rush moved west into Alaska, however, the Jewish community went with it and the cemetery, which had

Summer Jobs Grant

The grant will create summer employment for 72 young people.

Among the recipients were Petah Tikva Anshe Castilla Congregation; the Koffler Gallery; B'nai Brith Canada; Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue; Bnei Akiva of Canada/Camp Moshava; Camp Eitan; Emunah Women; Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto; Jewish Immigrant Aid Services; and Mizrachi Organization of Canada.

JFS Sends Supplies

MONTREAL — In the wake of this month's explosion at the L'Accueil Bonneau, a large shipment of much-needed supplies from the Jewish community was sent to the homeless shelter's new Marché Bonsecours location.

The effort was coordinated by Le Mercaz, a program of Jewish Family Services (JFS) of Baron de Hirsch.

JFS sent a truckload of merchandise, including men's clothing, linens and other items, in order to assist a "longstanding institution, which for many years has performed a valuable service for the homeless and destitute," said FEDERATION CJA president Stanley Plotnick.

ISRAEL

Religion Bill Submitted

JERUSALEM — Seven Israeli legislators submitted a bill in the Knesset aimed at protecting freedom of religion for all Israelis. One of the legislators, Hagai Meirom of the Labor party, said the bill would allow Conservative and Reform Jews to enjoy full religious rights in Israel.

Israel Willing To Talk

JERUSALEM — Israel reaffirmed that it would hold talks with Lebanon and Syria if the negotiations take place without preconditions. The comment came from a Foreign Ministry spokesperson one day after Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri told President Bill Clinton during a meeting in Washington that a peace agreement with Israel could be negotiated in three months if Israel resumes negotiations where they left off with Syria in March 1996.

Netanyahu Angry

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu is reportedly angry at Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai for pushing him to reach an agreement regarding a further West Bank redeployment. The prime minister said he would not be rushed into a decision.

An Israeli government official, meanwhile, was quoted as saying a redeployment agreement would have to include a letter of assurance from Washington that it would oppose any unilateral declaration of Palestinian statehood until the peace process is completed.

Monitoring Proposed

JERUSALEM — A Knesset member has proposed that a special unit be formed to monitor haredi Jews who are exempted from compulsory military service in order to devote their lives to Torah study. Ran Cohen of the leftist Meretz party claimed that some 20,000 Haredim who receive military exemptions have paying jobs instead of attending a yeshivah.

Youth Detained

HEBRON — Two youths from a home for troubled children were detained on suspicion of killing a Palestinian on a West Bank road. According to police, the two youths stuck a wooden plank out the window of their van, hitting the Palestinian farmer as they drove past him.

WORLD

Canadians Graduate

NEW YORK — Twenty-two Canadians were among more than 1,700 graduates receiving degrees at Yeshiva University's 67th annual commencement, held recently in the theatre at Madison Square Garden.

Bachelor's and associate degrees were awarded to graduates of Yeshiva College, Stern College for Women, Sy Syms School of Business, James Striar School of General Jewish Studies and Isaac Breuer College of Hebraic Studies.

Guide Distributed

NEW YORK — In honor of Deaf/Blind Awareness Week, which commemorates the birthdate of Helen Keller (June 27, 1880), the Orthodox Union is offering a free guide to help synagogues become more blind/deaf friendly.

Among the tips included in the guide are providing interpreters for services and other synagogue and community events, designating specific seats for the deaf to make it easier to see the interpreter or read lips, and providing prayer books in large print.

CJC Committee Heads Named

MONTREAL — Moshe Ronen, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) national president, has announced the names of the people who will head the organization's national standing committees.

Prof. Sheva Medjuck of Halifax will chair the social action committee (formerly known as the law and social action committee); Harold Brief and Simon Rosenblum of Toronto will serve as chair and vice-chair respectively of the national Israel affairs committee; Mark Weintraub of Vancouver heads the national community relations committee, with Ellen Cole of Toronto as vice-chair.

Hal Joffe of Calgary will take charge of security; Les Scheininger of Toronto, a former CJC president, will chair public policy and international relations, with Cary Green of Toronto as vice-chair; Rabbi Reuven Bulka of Ottawa will head up religious and inter-religious affairs. Co-chairing the national small communities committee are Michael Sobol of Guelph, Michael Peters of Victoria and Hedda Medjuck of Halifax.

Thomas Kuttner of Fredericton chairs the constitution and charter review committee; CJC past president Prof. Irving Abella of Toronto chairs the war crimes committee and the CJC board of governors; Nathan Leipciger of Toronto will continue as chair of the national Holocaust remembrance committee, adding Harold Sosnowicz of Winnipeg as vice-chair.

Canadians to share in slave labor compensation

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For 53 years, Rose Besser has lived with awful memories of forced labor at the munitions factory at Peterswaldau in Lower Silesia.

Treated as a slave, Besser never received a pfenning for her work assembling the timing device for German bombs. But now, thanks to the boastful lies of the industrialist who profited from her unpaid labor and the alert eye of one of his former workers, Besser will receive some compensation for the grueling work she put in at the Diehl Company's munitions factory.

"Happy, not happy, who would believe that this would ever come out?" she says today. Besser will receive 15,000 Deutschmarks (about $12,000) as compensation for 15 months of slave labor.

Besser never thought she'd ever get a cent, but that changed recently thanks to the efforts of a former worker at the plant who declines to be identified. A landsman of Besser from the Polish town of Sosnowiecz, the woman remained in Germany after the war.

She was watching television at her home in Germany last spring when she was stunned to see the industrialist who owned the factory receive an award as man of the year, Besser says. The woman couldn't believe her eyes as Karl Diehl was lauded for his kindness and philanthropy. Especially galling was his public statement that he never used slave labor in his wartime factories.

The woman, of course, knew better. After the camp was liberated in May 1945, she and another girl found and kept a roster of all the slave laborers employed at the camp. With that evidence in hand, she contacted the German media and exposed Diehl's wartime profiteering. The result was twofold: Diehl had to withdraw his claim of never using slave labor and the Nuremberg-based Diehl firm established a trust fund to compensate workers who toiled at the company's factories in Peterswaldau and Langenbielau .

The compensation varies according to the number of months of forced labor. The maximum of 15,000 DM goes to those who worked from nine to 14 months; 5,000 DM goes to those who labored for three to eight months.

In offering the compensation, the Diehl firm states it is doing so "for humanitarian reasons and without recognizing any legal obligations."

So far, only 180 people have applied for the compensation. "I notified people in Toronto, Montreal, Miami, Los Angeles and Hartford," Besser said. "The majority of people don't remember that they worked at the Diehl factory.

"A lot just put it out of their minds," adds her husband, Frank, who was forced to dig ditches near the factory as Russian forces advanced.

For Rose, thinking about the camp still brings on strong emotions and many tears. For her, Peterswaldau was the last in a series of concentration and slave labor camps she endured during the war. She was sent to Peterswaldau in February 1944 from Wiezan and she was put to work on timing devices for bombs.

Conditions in the factory were hard. The women, from Poland and Hungary, were forced to work 12-hour days and subsist on two slices of bread and a bowl of watery soup. The female SS ruled the work camp with ruthlessness, creating a climate of fear among the 1,300 prisoners.

Rose and Frank Besser, shortly after the war

Besser shared a barracks with 250 other girls and slept in a wooden bunk with only some straw for comfort. The massive room was heated by a single stove in the corner. Sick people were taken to an isolation room and then out of the camp to be murdered. For suffering those conditions while making Diehl rich, Besser and the others never received a pfenning — until today.

The deadline for compensation claims is Dec. 31, 1999. Claims can be sent to Helene Maringer, Bockenheimer Land St. 81, Frankfurt Am Mein 60325, Germany.

In other developments, Volkswagen (VW) has rejected compensation demands by 30 former Jewish slave laborers, the Jewish Telegraphic Agency reported.

The Hungarian-born survivors, who were taken from Auschwitz to work at VW headquarters in Wolfsburg between 1944 and 1945, plan to sue the car company. The company argues that the German government is responsible for settling such claims because it is the legal successor to the Nazi regime.

Celebratory publications

The celebration of Yom Ha'atzmaut has come and gone, but the celebration of Israel's 50th anniversary is ongoing.

These celebrations take many forms.

First and foremost are myriad activities: concerts, parties, gatherings and showcases, private and public, that will run throughout the year. Readers are well advised to check their local community calendars for the details of the many public activities.

There are also a number of special publications that have been produced to commemorate the anniversary.

I want to draw readers' attention to two such publications, each unique and exceptionally informative.

JeMM Productions in Jerusalem has produced an interactive CD entitled Portrait of Israel. It is a multimedia exploration, a journey of the people and a journal of the events of the first 50 years of the State of Israel through the stark, evocative photographic archives of one of Israel's leading photographers, David Rubinger.

Rubinger, now a photographer for Time-Life, was born in Vienna in 1924 and at the age of 15, he moved to Israel, where he lived on Kibbutz Bet Zera.

Almost all of us, at one time or another, have seen and been moved by a Rubinger photograph.

He has been witness to the key moments of Israel's young history and has chronicled the country's greatest achievements and its most sorrowful tragedies. So non-intrusive yet so very deeply penetrating are the insights of his camera, that it seems, at times, as if he were an invisible companion along the road travelled by the colorful, diverse subjects in his photos.

It has three sections. The first is called the Gallery. It contains 50 of Rubinger's favorite photographs, each accompanied by a personal voice-over commentary by the photographer himself.

The 50 photos in the Gallery are a chronological time travel tryptich down memory lane. And there are moments, literally, when the shivers from the goosebumps cause the viewer too young to remember 1948 but old enough to know 1967, to pause, reflect and sigh.

For example we see a photo of Oskar Schindler taken in May 1961 as he is greeted in Israel by a cheering, tearfully happy throng of people whom he saved from the Nazis.

There is also the touchstone photo of the Six Day War: the young paratroops at the Western Wall, moments after they participated in its recapturing. We are told in the accompanying commentary why the soldiers seem to be looking heavenward.

"I was crying when I took the picture. Maybe that is why it became so famous. I don't know. I had reached the Wall 10 or 15 minutes after it was taken by these guys whom you see here. The place was so narrow... that I had no way of taking a picture with both the soldiers and the Wall except by lying down in a corner. It is that angle that makes the photo."

Without exception, each of the Gallery photographs freezes the mind and focuses one's thoughts onto an especially precious moment in time.

The second section of the CD is the Theatre. It contains slide shows on five distinct topics, along with video clips of a TV documentary prepared by Rubinger, called Then and Now.

The third section is the Archives; it contains 1,000 photos, including 370 rare and remarkable portraits of 13 famous leaders – from Menachem Begin and David Ben-Gurion, to Anwar Sadat and Ariel Sharon – whose lives have influenced Israel's development. The archival photos are arranged both by subject and by date.

* * *

The author is quick to clarify that even though the State of Israel is only 50 years old, the work deals with 100 years of art.

"This book is about the art of a place (Palestine, Eretz Yisrael, Land of Israel, Israel) rather than the art of a state. To be precise, it is about 100 years of artistic discourse with a national ideal and the manner of its implementation in the land of Israel."

As far as I know, this is the first comprehensive, overview history of the development of "Israeli" art.

* * *

The Rubinger photo journal and the Ofrat art history are exceedingly important educational instruments that may help impart a sense of the poignant past to the younger generations for whom Israel, controversial and even exciting, may be only a place of the present.

Special needs kids will go to summer camp, Harris says

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Parents of children with special needs, including those at the Zareinu Educational Centre, are hopeful that a public relations offensive launched last week will loosen government purse-strings, and allow the kids to attend summer camp.

Both Premier Mike Harris and Community and Social Services Minister Janet Ecker were caught off guard by the PR tactic, in which 8-year-old Zareinu student Chantalle Wahl and Ontario Liberal Leader Dalton McGuinty held an impromptu press conference to denounce the Tory government for cuts to a program that allows special needs children to attend camp.

The cuts would affect up to 400 families in Toronto and York Region – perhaps as many as 1,000 – said Carol Goldman, educational director of Zareinu, a Jewish day school for about 50 children with special needs.

Goldman said almost all of Zareinu's 50 students would be affected by the cuts.

Over the past few weeks, families of children like Chantalle received letters from Ecker's ministry, informing them that the financial assistance they had received in the past would not be available to them this summer.

The program, known as Special Services at Home, provides funds for camp mediators – trained attendants for campers with cerebral palsy, Down Syndrome, autism and other disorders.

The letters suggested that anyone dissatisfied with the decision to cut the funds either appeal or go on a waiting list. But Goldman points out that the letters came in April and May – too late for kids who had already been signed up for camp this summer.

Premier pledges to correct the problem

"How do you go on a waiting list in June? The parents are in total despair," she told The CJN.

Following the news conference, the premier pledged to correct the problem.

"I can assure you, to the best of my knowledge, we certainly have not reduced any funding or changed any program in this area," Harris said during Question Period, in response to a query from McGuinty.

The premier added: "I can tell you also, if there is a specific child, the one you mentioned, or others, who has been eligible in the past and is not today…we'll make sure they go to camp."

Ecker told reporters that the budget for the special program has actually increased over the past three years, and that she had not approved any cuts.

"I'm not aware of any policy changes that would have caused those letters to go out," she said. "If there were inappropriate decisions that were made, I will follow through with that."

The remarks by Harris and Ecker were of some comfort to Goldman. As of last week, she was flooding both their offices with copies of the rejection letters parents had received.

She was also in touch with Jewish Family & Child Service, which arranges for some of the mediators.

"My goal is not political," she said. "My goal is to send these kids to camp."

Aviva Spiro of Thornhill was one of the parents who received a letter denying her funds for a mediator. But that won't prevent her 6-year-old son, Ezra, also a Zareinu student, from attending camp.

Spiro plans to pay for a mediator (up to $2,000) out of her own pocket, but she will demand reimbursement from the government.

"We got [funding] for the last three years. Where is the money now? I'm not going to back down. This is too important."

Disabled Israeli vets enjoy R and R in Ontario

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The price paid for 50 years of Jewish statehood was graphically illustrated recently, with the annual visit of disabled Israeli soldiers to Toronto.

Under the auspices of Aid to Disabled Veterans of Israel Beit Halochem Canada, 10 veterans of the all-too-numerous wars Israel has fought came to Toronto recently, to meet the community, and to "know that we support them – that we are behind them," explained Beit Halochem Canada former president Shaila Gottlieb.

Most of all, though, the trip was for the soldiers' benefit, she said, a kind of R and R for those who have, and many still are, suffering from the results of their injuries as well as the psychological devastation of their experiences.

"Some are very traumatized when they come," Gottlieb said. "But when they see that people accept them, and that they are received with honor, they seem so much better. Their families have said they notice the difference in them."

The soldiers are billeted in private homes, and spend time with their host families, as well as with a cadre of volunteers. Among the "touristy" activities they have enjoyed this trip are Niagara Falls, the Science Centre, the Island Yacht Club, SkyDome, a cruise in Toronto harbor, the zoo, and a view of Symphony of Fire from the Manulife Roof Deck.

They were entertained in private homes as well, which gave them the opportunity to interact with people in an informal setting.

One of the highlights of their two-week trip, was a day spent at local day schools – Shearim, Heschel, Associated, Or Ha'emet, Netivot, Leo Baeck, United Synagogue Day Schools and Bialik.

The CJN caught up with four of the soldiers, Waitzman Effraim, Adi Nagar, Amiram Shaar and Nimrod Bachar speaking to a Grade 6 class at Bialik.

The students were spellbound by the veterans stories of their life in the military, and by their accounts of how they were injured and their rehabilitation.

They were particularly moved by Shaar's story of his participation in northern Israel during the Yom Kippur War. Badly injured, he thought he was going to die. Instead, a close friend risked his own life to save him.

Effraim told the students that with Israel having a small population, compared to the 65 million Arabs in the surrounding countries, the need for peace is imperative.

"We wish to be at peace. We must be at peace," he said.

What was stressed during the program was that disabled veterans range in age from very young to middle-aged, and that the situation affected not only them, but their families as well. Beit Halochem provides recreation for the whole family, not just the veteran.

Gottlieb noted that many are still in pain, although they put up a strong front. "They really have to be strong – many have children going into the army, and they have to be strong to support them."

The visits, she said, demonstrate "the partnership of love: one on one, and soul to soul."

As part of their Israel at 50 celebrations, the Grade 6 class made jewelry, which they sold at auction to fellow students. They donated the $120 that they raised to the Aid to Disabled Veterans Beit Halochem Canada. Grade 6 teacher Tobi Kaufman organized the project.

Hungarian survivor honored

By STACEY STEIN
Student Intern

TORONTO — The achievements and bravery of Hungarian Holocaust survivor Eugene Winter were celebrated recently at a gala dinner held by the Emanuel Foundation in honor of his memory.

The event, at Le Parc banquet centre in Thornhill, also honored the memories of Allan, Ethel and Larry Grossman. Allan Grossman and his son Larry both enjoyed long and active political careers with Ontario's Progressive Conservative party.

Born in Budapest, Winter was a leader in the Hungarian Jewish community. As a member of the Hungarian resistance movement during World War II, he sabotaged several Nazi institutions and liberated occupied cities. After moving to Canada in 1951, Winter helped settle newly arrived Hungarians and Jews in Canada and founded the Canadian Federation of Jews of Hungarian descent.

In his first official address to the Jewish community as president of the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), Ronen said:

"It is a great pleasure to participate in this evening, honoring the memory of a great Jew and a great Canadian, Eugene Winter; a man who contributed so much to our community, to our people, to our country."

Ronen also spoke of the need for solidarity within the Jewish community.

"In the tradition of Eugene Winter... we must make common cause, we must form coalitions and network in groups and communities that rightly demand to be accepted and equal in a society which rejects hierarchies based on ethnocultural differences," he said.

Ronen also praised the Emanuel Foundation, which is dedicated to keeping alive the memory of the Holocaust.

"We can not, we will not be silent," he said. "We will not accept the revision of history; that is why the work of the Emanuel Foundation is so critical today and why it is so relevant."

Ronen pledged CJC's commitment to challenging the federal government to deliver on its promise of erecting a national Holocaust museum in Canada.

Actor Kelly Curtis, daughter of Tony Curtis, spoke of the importance of non-profit organizations such as the Emanuel Foundation, founded by Tony Curtis in memory of his father, Emanuel Schwartz.

"I am inspired by your commitment to our important mission," she said.

Citing Winter, Raoul Wallenberg and her father as some of her heroes, she said: "Societally, we've come to equate celebrity – our sports and movie stars, especially – with heroism. We have confused the two as if they are interchangeable, and they are not."

Also present at the dinner were Hungarian Consul General Gabor Menczel and several local politicians, including MPP Monte Kwinter and Toronto councillor Milton Berger.

It was the first time the Emanuel Foundation held its annual dinner in Canada. Proceeds from the benefit dinner went towards completion of the Raoul Wallenberg memorial park in Budapest, built in honor of the Swedish war hero.

Former U of T paper pulled for anti-Jewish article

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A former University of Toronto (U of T) student newspaper that linked Jews to the pornography industry has been pulled from its drop-off location at the university and the editors' e-mail privileges have been cancelled.

The move came in the wake of complaints about the contents of a story carried in The New Edition, a four-page tabloid newspaper that was distributed free of charge at the U of T's New College and at other locations. The paper, published and edited by former U of T students, carried an article that Jewish groups and the school's assistant principal found offensive.

The article claims Jews control a multi-billion dollar pornography business and participate in it as actors and producers. The article also claims that since Jews are used to "hatred from society, Jews will do its dirty work – such as money lending in the Middle Ages or porn today – for the opportunity to make money.

"Persecuted for millennia in the various societies they've lived in, many Jews developed an allegiance to their own survival as their highest value and care little about the survival of the persecuting society...Many Jews hate the majority culture," the article states.

The story employs "gross stereotypes of Jews that are hurtful and shameful," said Lance Davis, director of education for Jewish Campus Services.

"It's despicable and a misrepresentation of the Jewish people."

Danny Fine, spokesperson on community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, said the article is "not only insulting, it's also extremely offensive." The article "causes prejudice towards an identifiable group," he suggested.

"I just found the slant of the [article] was totally offensive," said Sally Walker, assistant principal and registrar at New College. "This is not the sort of thing we want circulating in the college." Walker said she collected all copies of the paper she could find at the college.

Until three years ago, The New Edition was the student newspaper at New College but since then, the college has terminated its association with the paper, Walker said.

The student council now publishes another newspaper but it appears The New Edition has gone "underground" and is published irregularly, she added.

None of the editorial staff or publisher of The New Edition are current University of Toronto students, said Susan Addario, a spokesperson for the university's Office of Student Affairs.

Her investigation of the paper revealed that some members of the paper's editorial staff were at one time student leaders or were involved in the campus media in leadership positions. In that capacity, they were entitled to a general delivery electronic mailbox and access to the school's electronic bulletin board. Since publication of the controversial story, that access has been cut off, she said.

The newspaper itself is a ragged collection of items that include record reviews, stream of consciousness rants and a survey of adult magazines. The fourth page of the paper is a full-page ad placed by Chrysler Canada.

The pornography article is an edited version of a much longer item that appeared on the Internet at a Web site operated by someone described as Luke Ford.

The Web site is a collection of articles touching on various aspects of the adult film industry, but it also includes biographical material about Ford, the Web author. He is described as the son of Christian evangelist Desmond Ford who grew up as a Seventh Day Adventist in Australia until he moved to California in 1977.

Ford claims to be "an internationally known speaker and writer" on topics ranging from entertainment to ethics. He also appears to be intrigued by Dennis Prager, the Los Angeles-based author and commentator on Jewish issues. In addition to operating his own Web site on the pornography industry, Ford runs a Web site [www.dennisprager.net] that features many of Prager's articles on Jewish topics.

Congratulations, students

Who among us does not remember our first day of school? For most of us, the scene of the young child fearfully clinging to a parent, cringing at the thought of being separated from home for an entire school day, terror-stricken at the impending prospect of being handed over into the custody of some stranger, possibly even a monster or a witch, is an exaggeration. It did not happen.

But for all of us, our first day was nevertheless, a trip into the unknown and the beginning of the up and down, exciting and dull, joyful and tearful journey we would subsequently call formal education, or simply, school.

At this time of year, in every community on earth where schools exist, students on that journey are moving forward, stepping up onto different platforms and entering different stations along the way. Some are even leaving the journey altogether, graduating from it with undiminished relief, a ceremonial rite of passage, into the next phase of their lives.

It is therefore appropriate, given the time of year, and the intense, mostly motivated movements by countless millions of children on that journey, that we commend all students for their achievements.

For some students who find the journey itself very difficult, merely the effort of staying on as long as they can is an achievement. Others may strive for higher levels of personal excellence and higher individual results may be their achievements.

No achievement, however, is too small to be noticed and appreciated by the people that count most in our students' lives: their parents and their families. Each act of noticing and each expression of appreciation are building blocks, of sorts. Over the years, they form the constantly buffeted foundation on which a student's belief in self, belief in the "system" and belief in his or her future will ultimately rest.

We therefore take great pleasure in congratulating our students for their many worthy and worthwhile achievements. And we hope all parents notice.

Thank you, teachers

In congratulating our children, though, we must at the same time, convey thanks to their teachers. For without the aid of their teachers, our children's journey through school would be a blind, undirected excursion through buildings and portables but not through learning.

To be sure, not all teachers have a lasting influence upon their students. But no teacher desists from trying to influence them. They all participate in our children's education. This too should be noticed and appreciated, especially these days.

Educational budgets are repeatedly threatened and often slashed; teachers' ability to participate to the very best of their abilities has been compromised. Classroom resources are being reduced even as classroom problems – pedagogical, social, psychological and emotional – are increasing.

Our sages taught us to "revere our teachers in the same way that we revere heaven." In this day and age, that notion seems strangely odd. More often than not, teachers are scapegoated by governments, rather than extolled.

Jewish tradition holds that school children may not be interrupted from their studies even for the building of the Temple. The point of the parable is to vividly demonstrate that no activity contains within it more far-reaching societal benefits than that of "being in school," learning, achieving great and small individual achievements.

Therefore, at this time of year, we also say thank you to our teachers.

Rabin honored at Yom Ha'atzmaut in Israel

One dare not fail to recognize the anguish experienced by Leah Rabin at the horrendous assassination of her husband and one does not gainsay her right to express the anger and bitterness which she understandably feels.

In her pain,though, she should not distort facts.

In her interview with Ron Csillag (CJN, June 11), she asserted that at the 50th anniversary Jubilee celebration "his name [that of Yitzhak Rabin] was hardly mentioned" and she alleged that "they" do anything to conceal his role in history and the place he has in the people's hearts and minds.

I – with several other Torontonians – was at that Jubilee celebration in Jerusalem on Yom Ha'atzmaut. Not only did the beautiful souvenir book given to all spectators prominently dedicate a page to "He shall be the peacemaker..." (including a photograph of the Rabin-Hussein-Clinton handshakes), but at a very appropriate point in the proceedings, while a huge symbolic dove of peace drifted across the stage, the large video screens portrayed images of Rabin during his long and distinguished career, and Shir haShalom, The Song of Peace, now associated so clearly with him and that terrible night, was featured.

Believes Loeb is an Ashkenazi name

I was interested in reading your report (CJN, May 28) that Theodor Herzl was of Sephardi descent. This is very possibly so, but your contributor doesn't prove his point by producing the surname Loeb.

Loeb, also spelt Löb, Loewe, Leib, Leibush, Leybl, is an essentially Ashkenazi name, being Yiddish for lion, and it is often coupled with Yehuda or Aryeh. Nothing Sephardi about it.

A different view of spirituality conference

This conference was much more about how to approach our lives than our work. Spirituality is about asking questions. It is not about providing answers.

"To do this work you have to be complete with your own religion," Martin Rutte suggests. Through his own process of personal discovery about Judaism, from Orthodoxy to Reform, from Reconstructionist to Conservative, he began to see how alive and flowing, how human and full of foibles and differences Judaism is. He passionately states, "I learned through my exploration of Judaism that we don't want to use religion to separate, but rather to unleash human potential, to deepen the level of authenticity within each and every one of us."

Each of us must go on this personal journey of self discovery, to explore our roots. Unwillingly this conference about work and spirituality takes me back to Lech l'cha and Abraham. For me, what he was really saying was that each of us must explore our own paths and journeys, all the way back, and then move forward. How exciting! This message goes far beyond the place of spirituality in the workplace.

Arafat's plan for peace does not include Israel

As reported in The CJN June 11, Leah Rabin considers Yasser Arafat as a trustworthy partner in the ongoing negotiations. One has to agree with her when she states that he "wants peace," as indeed Arafat proved time and again in words and deeds, beyond any reasonable doubt, his ardent desire for peace in the Middle East, minus Israel.

By CHAD FINKELSTEIN

Dehumanization. Rehumanization. After hours of reflection, I decided that these two words seemed to be only ones in the English language that could describe what I saw, that described where I was, that described what happened. For I recently returned from the most important experience of my life – the March of the Living.

In the two weeks I spent in Poland and Israel, I witnessed the contrast between death and life, darkness and light, mourning and pride. The only way that I can begin to express the pain and joy that I felt simultaneously is to tell it exactly as it happened, using parts of my journal. I can start my story here, but the real story can never end.

Sunday/Monday, April 19/20

Today is April 19, the first day of the March of the Living. We are in the middle of spring, so the weather should be nice. Not here, though. Not in Poland. There seems to be an appropriately dark cloud looming over this country.

We immediately set off for Warsaw to visit the Gensha Cemetery, which was built before the war. It seemed like a fitting introduction to our trip. A strange chill passed through my body as I saw my first physical piece of Holocaust history.

Our final stop of the day was at Janusz Korczak's orphanage. Korczak tried to stop young children from being transported to a gas chamber death, until he himself was sent to be gassed along with them at Treblinka.

It has not stopped raining yet.

Tuesday, April 21

We left for the Warsaw Ghetto this morning. It is all destroyed now and the area functions, simply, as part of the city. Without walls around us, it is difficult to envision the brutal confinement. As we walked down the Path of Heroism where the martyrs of the ghetto are commemorated by individual memorials, Polish teenagers yelled at us to "get out." Some of us saw a woman allow her dog to urinate on one of the monuments. We stood on top of Mila 18, the command bunker in the Jewish revolt against the Nazis.

At 4:45, we left for a cemetery in the town of Kielce. Tomorrow we are going to Auschwitz, and I cannot even begin to anticipate my reaction.

Wednesday, April 22

As we neared Auschwitz, the mood in the bus changed. We rolled over the infamous train tracks and entered the camp on a bus with air-conditioning, food and comfortable seats. It was an unsettling entrance for some of us. Though we tried to make sense of where we actually were, seeing a snack bar in front of the camp gates did not make the scenario any easier to grasp. This is Auschwitz?!

The group shuddered as we approached the chilling sign that introduced so many families to their deaths: Arbeit Macht Frei – work sets you free.

Actually, the place had a very artificial feel. If I did not know the history, I would never have thought it had been a concentration camp from the way it has been preserved. The owners have transformed the nightmares into a museum, with photographs taking the place of blood stains on walls. One of the survivors remarked that there was no grass at Auschwitz 55 years ago, as there is now. Had there been, she said, she would have eaten it.

Birkenau is where most of the killing took place. With each step I took, I tried to envision what happened on the ground I was walking on. Whose blood and ashes were beneath my feet, forever ingrained into the soil of Birkenau? I tried to imagine what filled the empty wagons leaning against barracks that still bore the stench of death. I tried to visualize what one small wooden "bed" looked like with 15 skeletal bodies crammed into it for only a few hours of uncomfortable sleep. However, I was unsuccessful.

Judy Cohen, the survivor who travelled with us, pinpointed the exact spot where the evil Dr. Joseph Mengele conducted his demonic selections and showed us that where we were standing was where she saw her family for the last time. I still could not picture such inhumanity.

The sun finally came out, but the atmosphere remained the same. We were walking through a factory of death, a place where terrified arrivals were sent straight to the gas chambers and the sky was filled daily with their burnt souls.

Thursday, April 23

Today is the International March of the Living. The sun is out again, but now it feels strangely befitting. Whereas yesterday was about mourning, today is about marching in pride. The good weather was welcome.

The march began, led by Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. We were 7,000 strong, and a sea of blue jackets filled the small town of Auschwitz. We walked mostly in silence, except for the odd remark expressing disbelief that we were redoing one of the many infamous death marches. Water was passed around, and one of the survivors declined, saying that he did not get water the first time around and did not want to have any this time. It was an eerie statement that put the day into perspective.

Friday, April 24

I am at Majdanek. This is the only camp where every single remnant has been kept completely intact. We were told that it could be up and running in 48 hours! Again, I try to visualize the horrors but am unsuccessful.

Ten minutes ago, I walked through the gas chamber…I walked through the gas chamber …I walked through the gas chamber…and then I walked out. Barely. It was packed and difficult to concentrate inside amid all the camera flashing. I was at a complete loss for thought. My head was pounding as we entered and a gruesome image appeared in my mind. There I was, with 150 people, marching into the gas chamber. I stood at the back and waited as I saw my peers crowd through the doors. Suddenly, I saw everybody around me in the enclosed area with the holes in the ceiling above our heads. I knew what was supposed to happen after that and I had to get out. I could not breathe; I began to suffocate.

I walked through the gas chamber…I walked through the gas chamber…I am aching for comfort from people, but at the same time, I have never wanted to be more alone in my life.

Then there are the pictures. I have seen them before, but now they all seem new. There are two barracks filled with prisoners' shoes. Two whole buildings filled with belongings that everybody packed but did not know they would never see or use again. More shoes than I have ever seen. I felt a little reserved about touching them. Just thinking about who could have been wearing each pair sent an uncomfortable chill down my spine. But I did touch one shoe and I feel as if I now have physical evidence engraved into my fingertips.

The walk continued past the barbed wire towards the crematorium and the mausoleum. I had been told earlier that there were ashes left at Majdanek, but I did not know where to find them. I walked into the crematorium and looked around. The images were harrowing. From the dissection table to the actual furnaces, it all seemed so surreal. There was also a box with an inscription stating that inside were bones of victims. This object was frightening, even though I could not see what was inside. In a state of mental paralysis, I stumbled over to the mausoleum, expecting to see another memorial. A mountain of ash there, right in front of us, sent a knife right through my heart. It was not a picture. It was the real thing. Hundreds of thousands of actual human beings robbed of their lives and shattered into dust. Like everyone else, I became wrapped in a catatonic state. My eyes were glazed, my mouth dropped and my speech was stifled as shock overtook my body.

Sunday, April 26

There is a terrible history here at Treblinka that I never knew. Of the 900,000 people who entered this hell on earth, only 80 survived. Eighty people! Fortunately, and unfortunately as well, the entire camp has been destroyed. All that is left is a field of stones. It is hard to grasp that this place was a demonic death camp. At this point, all of our emotions are so numb, anyway, that I do not think we can have any more of the horror pounded into our minds.

We are all extremely anxious to get out of Poland and head to Israel.

Monday, April 27-Monday, May 4

When we stepped off the plane onto Israeli ground, a flood of life was injected into my body. The rush of adrenaline evoked tears of happiness for the first time since before we left Toronto. People kissed the ground, and most of us danced on the runway, oblivious to the traffic of the airfield. It was 7 a.m., I was physically exhausted, but at the same time, had never been so awake in all my life.

The air was filled with the scent of freedom.

I have never been more relaxed or more joyful than I was that week in Israel. I do not think there are names for the colors that we witnessed on mountainous nature hikes, natural spring and waterfall tours, or captivating sunsets that lit up the sky on a warm Israeli evening. I was proud of who I was and where I was, and those surrounding me were struck by this optimism, as well.

We had seen the evils but were now in a place of life. We stated loudly on the nation's 50th anniversary that we are here and nothing will ever change that. We told the world that never again would the horror and bloodshed of the Holocaust happen. We said it with pride. We said it with emotion. We said it with joy. And we said it together.

The March of the Living is not only about learning about the Holocaust. It is about learning about one's self. I feel that through my daily journal entries, countless rolls of film and selected pieces of feelings that I have chosen to reveal to others, I have learned who I am and have developed a new appreciation for life. It was an extremely important trip for me as a person, not just as a Jew, and one that I will never forget.

What one must come away with from a venture like this is a message to give to the world that no such dehumanization can ever happen again. A message of peace and of racial tolerance. A message that we can never forget.

NEXT WEEK

Jerusalem's Jewish exodus

By ROBERT SARNER

Next month, my brother-in-law and his wife will leave Jerusalem to move to the north of the country. They say it won't happen a moment too soon. Both were born and grew up in Jerusalem. Both insist daily life in the capital has become intolerable, and they aren't going to take it anymore.

By Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

They're not alone. When they bid farewell to their home town in a few weeks, they'll be joining a fast-growing legion of former Jerusalemites who have left the city in recent years. Many have settled in satellite communities near Jerusalem, some in Tel Aviv, others in the countryside; and a small minority have left Israel altogether.

The defection of Jerusalemites is not new. What is new is the sense of a hemorrhaging of young, secular Jewish adults who see little future for themselves in the Holy City. That's the perception, if not the total reality, and it is the object of increasing debate between demographers, statisticians and politicians. Recent numbers paint a more complex picture with two key questions dominating discussion: Just who is actually leaving and what is the impact of their departure on those left behind?

This month, in a new study on the outward migration, the Jerusalem Institute for Israel Studies (JIIS) published data that does not augur well if the city is to remain "the eternal capital of the Jewish people." The departure of Jewish residents, the JIIS reports, is a major factor in explaining why the number of Arabs in Jerusalem is now growing four times faster than the city's Jewish population. The high birth rate in the Arab sector plays a minor role as it is matched by an equally prolific haredi community.

It doesn't take a professional survey to know that Jewish residents are leaving in droves. Within my own circle of friends, relatives and colleagues, I know personally at least two dozen people who have left Jerusalem in the past year or two. Almost all are non-Orthodox, between 25 and 45 years old, who felt less and less comfortable in Jerusalem.

Much like with the migration of Jews out of Quebec in the last 20 years, those left behind start feeling like a threatened species. Every few weeks, with disturbing frequency, you hear of yet another person or young family who is leaving the city. Invariably they cite the same litany of grievances – insanely high housing prices (even with the current slump in the real estate market), poor job prospects, and the growing power and influence of the haredi community, which now represents close to one-third of the city's Jewish population.

There's of course nothing extraordinary about urban folk leaving for what's perceived to be greener pastures away from the city. But in Jerusalem, where anything that threatens the uneasy status quo is cause for controversy, the shifting demographics are attracting increased attention, especially in advance of future negotiations between Israel and Palestinians on the city's future political role.

According to the JIIS study, Jerusalem's Arab residents are expected to reach almost half (45 percent) of the city's population in 20 years, up considerably from the present 30 percent. Mayor Ehud Olmert lost no time in holding a press conference to use the new data to bolster his controversial campaign to add more Jewish residents to the capital by annexing large tracts of land (including several existing communities) west of the city.

The same study also explored why people leave Jerusalem. In 1996, the last year for which statistics were available, close to 6,000 more residents left the city than the number who moved in. The reason most cited was the high cost of housing.

Jerusalem, whose current population stands at just over 600,000, has the dubious distinction of being the poorest large city in the country, after the haredi bastion of Bnei Brak where many residents don't work. The loss to Jerusalem of thousands of young professionals every year isn't helping. In response, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu recently agreed to a hefty financial package to help students, young couples and new immigrants stay in the city, and to create more jobs as part of an effort to strengthen the Jewish presence in the city.

Before moving to Israel from France, my Jerusalem-born wife and I never dreamed of living in Jerusalem. Tel Aviv, whose style of life corresponded more to our sensibility, had figured prominently in our plans. But circumstances got in the way and we settled in Jerusalem. Over time, the city even got into my system. Today, seven years later, we're still here, but it's starting to feel increasingly lonely.

The nuclear fallout hits Israel

By GERALD M. STEINBERG

Although India and Pakistan are far from the Middle East, and their recent nuclear weapons tests were the result of political issues in South Asia, the aftershocks are still shaking Tel Aviv and Jerusalem. These events ended 24 years of stability, in which no new states joined the nuclear club, and in which the non-proliferation regime slowed the spread of nuclear weapons. The regime was less than perfect, and Iraq almost completed a secret program; but without the controls and inspections, it is likely that Iraq, Iran, Egypt, Syria and Algeria would all be nuclear powers by now.

By Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

The Pakistani test led to a revival of the fears of the "Islamic bomb" and the spread of nuclear weapons in the Middle East. In the 1970s when Pakistan started its atomic bomb project, a number of Arab countries provided assistance, including Libya and Saudi Arabia. Despite this support, and to their dismay, none of these states have received any nuclear assistance from Pakistan. The Pakistani military has kept its distance from the Arab-Israeli conflict, and relations with Iran are not always cordial. Thus, at this time, it is a mistake to speak of an "Islamic bomb."

In the long term, however, there is cause for concern. If the Pakistani economy is hurt by sanctions, some scientists, like their underpaid Russian counterparts, might be tempted to accept offers of employment in the nuclear programs of Iran, Iraq or other countries. In this way, the technology could leak into the Middle East. However, there are few atomic secrets, and the Iranian and Iraqi nuclear design teams are unlikely to receive much that they did not already know.

The greater concern is that as a result of the Indian and Pakistani nuclear tests, the nuclear non-proliferation regime will be weakened and the incentives of other states in the region to join the nuclear club will grow.

If Iran sees that Pakistan and India have been able to get away with defying international norms, it will accelerate its own program. Iraq, whose nuclear design teams are still intact, will quickly follow suit, and then the dam will break, with Egypt and Syria next in line. Israel, which has maintained the nuclear status quo since the mid-1960s, will be forced to react by developing an open nuclear deterrent and second strike force. This is not only expensive but also highly unstable and dangerous.

The links between the nuclear arms race in South Asia and the Middle East were reinforced by the publication of rumors tying Israel to the Indian tests, and by Pakistan's claims that Israeli F-16s were preparing to attack their nuclear facilities. It is true that Israel and India have developed a low-level relationship in the past five years, but the reports regarding Indian-Israeli military cooperation are greatly exaggerated. All aspects of the Israeli nuclear program are highly classified and any reports of cooperation with a foreign country such as India are not credible. Even if there were some reason to test in secret, Israeli officials are very unlikely to take the risks of exposure by even discussing such issues with foreign officials.

With respect to Pakistan, if there were indeed F-16s in Pakistani airspace, these were probably American aircraft, but it was easier to accuse Israel, and it recalled the Israeli raid on the Iraqi reactor in 1981.

Many parties have an interest in spreading false information regarding allegations of Israeli involvement. First, by attempting to link Israel to the Indian nuclear program and tests, Pakistan sought to delegitimize and isolate India in the Arab world. Facing international isolation and sanctions, Pakistan is looking to Iran and the Arab states for support, particularly financial aid, and the attempt to tie India and Israel into a single foreign non-Islamic force may be seen as useful in this process. (In the 1980s, the Arabs successfully sold the claims of Israeli nuclear cooperation with South Africa, but after the collapse of the apartheid regime, it became clear that this disinformation campaign was uncritically accepted despite the absence of evidence.)

India, for its part, also has an interest in linking itself to Israel, in order to reduce the impact of Delhi's own isolation following the nuclear tests. This may even lead some Indians to exaggerate such ties, precisely in order to help counter the degree of isolation.

In addition, the Palestinians and many Arab states have their own reasons for spreading false claims linking Israel to India. These rumors are designed to tar Israel with the international isolation and sanctions now being faced by Iran, Iraq, Pakistan and India. By using the Indian and Pakistani tests to highlight the Israeli nuclear option, Iran, Syria and perhaps other states in the region are seeking to justify their own nuclear weapons ambitions.

Israel has a strong interest in keeping a low profile with respect to these events, and the tests that shattered the regime can set off a chain reaction that Israel has sought to avoid for 30 years.

Leonardo da Vinci and Judaism

To most people, Leonardo da Vinci is primarily known as a painter of the Mona Lisa and other famous pictures. To his contemporaries, however, he was far more than a visual artist; he was also an architect, engineer, scientist, poet and musician. Benet's Readers Encyclopedia describes him as "one of the greatest intellects in the history of mankind... In his notebooks there are some 5,000 pages of sketches and comments that reveal his concern with anatomy, botany and mathematics, including mechanical perspective drawings, studies of people and animals, plant studies and landscapes."

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

So how does he get into this column? Recently the Italian Consulate in Toronto sent me a bilingual book (Italian and English), entitled Leonardo da Vinci and the Judaic Tradition. That is a subject which, to my knowledge and that of the author (Franco Bontempi), has only recently come to light.

It seems that at a crucial period of his life, Leonardo became a close friend of Amedeo Mendez da Silva, scion of a Jewish family that had converted to Christianity. Because of the conversion, the association of the two men aroused no criticism, but apparently Leonardo not only became acquainted with Jewish tradition and its world outlook for the first time, but it also began to influence his thinking.

The most interesting aspect of this relationship is the revelation that Amedeo was in fact a secret student of Kabbalah and that evidently he transmitted some of its perceptions to his famous friend. Leonardo, in turn – according to the booklet – incorporated some of the insights of Kabbalah into his paintings, but he did so in a manner never fully appreciated until now.

In the past, no one could ever explain why some of Leonardo's obtuse writings that dealt with the themes of his own work were written from right to left. Obviously he wanted to make it difficult for readers to comprehend his true intentions. Unfortunately, even after one decodes the text, much of its meaning is still incomprehensible. Most definitely, Leonardo's writing method imitates Hebrew writing even though the artist did not know that language. But direction was everything to him and he incorporated mystical visions into the background of a few of his famous paintings. The little booklet elaborates some of these by giving examples, but I must admit that even Bontempi's explanation of Leonardo's mysterious designs exceeds my understanding.

There is no question that Leonardo's work has always met with enormous interest and that the attraction of the few paintings he has left to us has always bordered on the mystical.

According to Bontempi, the reason is his secret admiration of Judaism – an attitude that at the beginning of the modern age was not only unheard of but also dangerous.

The next time I visit the Louvre and admire the Mona Lisa, I shall be sure to take Bontempi's essay with me to check out his observations of Leonardo's connection with Jewish tradition. I have no idea when this visit might occur, but even the mere expectation makes me see the artist in a new light.

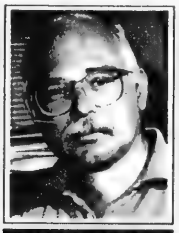
Debate about motivation courses through the IDF

"Motivation" has been a buzzword in the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) for the past few years.



By Sheldon Kirshner

In military parlance, the word, full of portentous implications, raises two separate but related questions. As measured by the willingness to serve in combat units, are young Israeli recruits and older reservists sufficiently motivated? Is national service valued as much as it was a generation ago?

The issues defy simple explanations because the data seems contradictory.

On the one hand, there has been a measurable decline in the "motivation-to-service" ratio: the desire to join combat formations.

The decline is generally ascribed to several factors: Israel's increased economic prosperity and heightened westernization; the perception that Israel's existence is more secure thanks to a series of peace agreements signed with Egypt, the PLO and Jordan; and the erosion of traditional collective values in the face of growing individualism.

As Lt.-Gen. Amnon Shahak, the outgoing chief of staff, gingerly put it recently: "We are witnessing a preference for the individual over the collective."

Some Israelis, such as Maj.-Gen. Gideon Sheffer, head of the IDF's personnel branch, believe that the late prime minister, Yitzhak Rabin, and his successor, Shimon Peres, are partly to blame for the downward slide in motivation.

In an appearance before the Knesset's Education Committee less than two years ago, the outspoken officer claimed that the Rabin and Peres governments were too liberal in granting exemptions from service. And in Sheffer's judgment, Rabin's ties with Avi Gefen, the counterculture pop singer who reportedly advised youths to avoid the draft, had an effect.

On the other hand, as observers hasten to caution, neither elite fighting detachments – the sayarots – nor specialized branches of the IDF associated with electronic warfare and computer systems have had any trouble attracting volunteers.

In a monograph entitled Towards A New Portrait of the (New) Israeli Soldier, published recently by Bar-Ilan University's Begin Sadat Centre for Strategic Studies, Stuart Cohen claims that the "motivation-to-service" rate has declined at an annual rate of two percent since 1992. According to Cohen, the decline appears most pronounced among native-born Israelis from secular, middle-class backgrounds, but less so among new immigrants.

The national religious community, however, has hardly been affected by this phenomenon, possibly because "patriotic" values are stressed in their network of schools and youth movements.

Just as serious, increasing numbers of reservists are evading service. In a presentation to the Knesset's Foreign and Defence Committee, Lt.-Col. Arieh Neiger, a battalion commander in the reserves, claimed that "tens of thousands of soldiers a year get out of reserve duty on some pretext or another."

The problem is so bad that it may well have an impact in the event of war, he warned.

Indeed, a report issued by the state comptroller stated that "social legitimacy" is now given to the evasion of reserve duty, and "a sense of being a sucker" is felt by those who do serve.

A year and a half ago, a pollster named Moddy Kidon surveyed 300 Israeli teenagers between the ages of 16 and 18, and discovered that 22 percent would refrain from joining the IDF if not for conscription. Kidon also found that 40 percent of his respondents think that the army stunts their personal development; 45 percent place personal fulfilment above national ideals; 71 percent believe their parents were more motivated; and 31 percent oppose a mandatory draft.

Even if they are not a completely accurate reflection of current reality, Kidon's findings seem to dovetail with the views of Brig.-Gen. Ika Abarvanel, the former head of manpower in the Ground Forces Command. Several months ago, in ominous tones, he declared, "There is a gradual decline in the value society puts on serving in the army."

This phenomenon, if true, may stem from a perception that the IDF, an institution synonymous with Jewish statehood, has gradually lost its allure as the central unifying element in Israeli society.

The IDF, all but worshipped during and after the 1967 Six Day War, has suffered repeated blows in the past 25 years.

Its lustre was tarnished by the 1973 Yom Kippur War, which caught the IDF somewhat off guard and resulted in frightful casualties; by the 1982 invasion of Lebanon, a war of choice which divided the nation; by the 1987-1993 Palestinian uprising (the intifadah), which was viewed in some circles as an exercise in brutal suppression; by the ongoing mini-war in southern Lebanon, whose end does not appear in sight; and by reports in the Israeli press which accused some Israeli soldiers of having killed Egyptian prisoners of war in 1956 and 1967.

Elite force

Last September, the IDF's prestige took another nosedive when an elite commando force was wiped out in Lebanon without accomplishing its mission.

Despite these facts, and the publication of surveys suggesting that the "motivation-to-service" ratio has fallen, the latest statistics released by Abarvanel suggest that the army's newest recruits are more motivated than in the immediate past.

The reasons are not hard to discern.

The IDF has doubled the pay of soldiers serving in combat field units and given them large demobilization bonuses. Furthermore, the IDF has launched a rejuvenated outreach program in high schools.

Still and all, the vast majority of Israeli men and women are conscripted by the IDF – 79.9 percent of males and 64.4 percent of females, according to figures released last year.

Almost seven percent of males of draft age do not serve for religious reasons (compared to 23 percent for women) and instead study in yeshivot. This phenomenon has caused untold grumbling and led to proposals for universal service.

Yet even as tens of thousands of yeshivah students evade the draft, more and more Jewishly observant officers are attaining senior command positions in the IDF.

The most prominent Orthodox Jews in the army today are Brig.-Gen. Ya'acov Amidror, a former intelligence officer and currently an aide to Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai; Brig.-Gen. Yair Naveh, who commands the paratroopers; and Brig.-Gen. Ephraim Fine, chief of the IDF's planning desk.

The rise of high-ranking kippah-wearing officers in the IDF hierarchy signifies a sea change: Orthodox Jews are becoming increasingly involved in the temporal affairs of the state. To others, such as Mordechai Gazit, the former head of military intelligence, the proliferation of religiously observant soldiers in the army is an ominous development.

Gazit, who recently caused a firestorm of controversy by likening the yarmulke to the Nazi swastika, believes there is a risk that highly motivated Orthodox soldiers and officers may not carry out orders which contradict their religious and political beliefs. Three years ago, a coalition of Orthodox Israeli rabbis urged Orthodox troops to refuse to vacate settlements in the territories. Would they obey this command?

The Story of the Jews, by Stan Mack (Random House, $27.95).

What, a cartoon history of the Jewish people? This is the original and audacious idea of Stan Mack a veteran New York cartoonist and longtime weekly columnist for the sardonic Village Voice.

This sweeping pictorial journey across 4,000 years begins with Abraham and Sarah, and provides sketches and brief text for all of the major events, as well as the outstanding men and women who have shaped the Jewish experience. There is also a mini-biography of Jesus that after considerable thought the author decided should be included.

The author, who stems from a secular background, spent two years in researching his material and lived for a brief period in Israel.

Mack's achievement is more difficult than it seems. Much factual information is conveyed in an easily absorbed and delightful fashion. Ideas and concepts that would take even gifted writers considerable space to explain are presented clearly and concisely.

This "hip and contemporary" illustrated narrative is especially recommended for bar mitzvah candidates, high school students and adults seeking a quick overview of a long and singular history.

Biblical Literacy, by Joseph Telushkin (William Morrow).

This survey of the essential ideas, events, laws, personalities and values of the Hebrew scriptures is a splendid achievement that compresses a vast amount of information in a manner both graceful and authoritative.

The author also makes clear how biblical ideas influence or clash with the thinking and trends of modern society as he draws upon his knowledge of extra biblical sources and commentary.

A feature of the volume is the enumeration and explanation of the 613 biblical commandments. Either for reference or stimulating perusal, this volume is highly recommended.

This is a short novel with an unusual and absorbing theme. It deals with a life and death struggle around the game of chess – and the players are bitter adversaries. The two protagonists of the story are competing young chess champions who meet again as master and inmate in a German death camp and finally in a surprising confrontation 60 years later. At the book's end there is death and retribution as a wealthy man is discovered shot to death in his Viennese villa, an unfinished chess game on his desk, apparently a suicide.

This first novel by an Italian businessman is not just a well-crafted thriller, but also a serious consideration of complex theological questions around the nature of the Holocaust and the absence of God. The author uses chess themes to probe some of the compelling moral and philosophical problems of our times.

The book's title refers to a chess strategy that is well known to both men and is at the heart of the story and its surprising climax.

In a metaphorical sense we are all chess players moved about by history in a game we do not initiate, and only dimly comprehend. But we must play and finish to the best of our ability.

A 'hip' look at the Jews

Jewish software programs

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Today, we conclude our look at Jewish software on the Internet. As I have mentioned, there are numerous places where you can buy commercial software and download Jewish shareware and other free programs.

Don't miss the Jewish Software archive at CompuJudaica [http://www.zoots.com/cj/soft.htm]. This is a massive repository of Jewish shareware, freeware and demo files for Windows. You can fill in your family tree using the genealogy software. Do you have trouble keeping track of your cubits? The Measurement Converter includes biblical measurements. You can try your hand at the Proverbs Quiz Game.

And when you walk away from your computer, you know it will be in good hands when it is running a Jewish Screen Saver.

Another great resource is Shareware.com because you can always search for the newest low cost programs to appear [http://www.shareware.com].

If you go there and type in the words Jewish or Hebrew, you'll come up with dozens of the newest programs available. I came across a neat little Calendar Conversion program that I'm trying out.

You really have to hand it to the folks at Hebrewsoft. They have scoured the Internet for Hebrew freeware and shareware and linked them back to their site [http://www.hebrewsoft.com/free&share/] under the following categories: games, education, Bible software, Jewish software, Internet development tools, word processors and utilities. Try your hand at Hebrew HangMan. Learn Hebrew from the Aleph Beth Tutorial. Download the entire Torah or Kizzur Shulchan Aruch texts.Use one of the gematria calculators to determine the numerical values contained within Hebrew words.

Israel, of course, has an incredible talent pool of software programmers and developers. Take a moment to look at the work being done by sophisticated Israeli hi-tech companies, most of which are geared at industrial users. Maven lists over 90 companies [http://www.maven.co.il/subjects/idx155.htm] – everything from Sirius Industries [http://www.siriustech.com/], a developer of medical software, to VocalTec, a world leader in the field of using the Internet to make low cost telephone calls [http://vocaltec.com/].

One of the oldest and best known developers and marketers of Jewish software is Davka Corporation [http://www.davka.com/], which carries a huge variety of programs. And don't miss the weekly special [http://www.davka.com/bargain.html]. The Comstar Company also carries an incredible selection of Hebrew Software [http://www.gy.com/www/he.htm].

Not only does the next company create some very interesting titles, it probably has the most titles for a Jewish software company. Right-to-Left Software [http://rtlsoft.com/hebrew/index.html] is based in Toronto and has developed such titles as Keyboard Melamed, a Hebrew typing tutor and Aryeh to Zebra, a sight and sound Hebrew/English/Yiddish Picture Dictionary. As a bonus, their site has instructions how to include today's Hebrew date on your Web site.

For yet more software links, take a look at Maven [http://www.maven.co.il/subjects/idx156.htm], Hareshima [http://www.hareshima.com/entertainment/software.htm] and Brooklyn's B'nei Shaare Zion Congregation [http://www.bsz.org/linkmain5.htm].

As I mentioned in my first article, I could not test out all of the software that I have mentioned. Fortunately, I did try out Babylon, Your Personal Translator. Babylon is an incredible and incredibly easy to use English Hebrew dictionary for Windows [http://www.babylon.co.il/eng/]. Right-click on almost any English word and a box appears on your screen with the Hebrew translation. It's that simple. The program is free for 100 days and can be renewed for free. My only regret is that the program doesn't translate from Hebrew into English. But that's a minor quibble for a program that's easy to use, elegant and free.

Jewish spiritual life needs modern expression

By RABBI RON AIGEN

The story of Korah tells of the struggle for political and religious authority within the ancient Israelite community. In the end, Korah and his followers are swallowed up in an earthquake as a Divine punishment, and Moses and Aaron are vindicated as the rightful leaders of the people. The surviving Israelites, who were not implicated in the rebellion, nevertheless cry to Moses, "We perish, we are all lost, all of us are lost... Alas we are doomed to perish." (Numbers 17:27-28)

Thus, even after the enemy has been eliminated, after the threat to the community is gone, the people still fear that the doom is imminent. This feeling that we are always on the brink of doom and disaster has been a recurrent theme throughout Jewish history.

All too many Jews still focus on the threat to Jewish survival as their raison d'être, rather than acknowledging the positive reality of the vital and vibrant Jewish community that now thrives worldwide.

In the mid-'80s Charles Silverman dared to chronicle the huge success story that is American Jewry in A Certain People, but his book was largely ignored. His statistics on the over-exaggerated threats of intermarriage and low birth rates were overtaken by the 1990 National Jewish Population Study which sparked a decade-long obsession with "continuity."

To be sure, continuity is something we are all for. But fear-inspired motivation turns out to be more of a negative than a positive force, generally resulting in a mind-set of circling the wagons and strengthening the barricade. Before we charge ahead, attacking only symptoms that we mistakenly perceive to be the problem, we ought to pause to ask what the real threat to our existence is, if there is one.

Our Torah story offers an important insight. The Israelites cried out that they faced doom. They felt the ground shaking beneath their feet. What they were experiencing was a paradigm shift – the community was undergoing a basic challenge in the structure of political and religious authority. We Jews have experienced that challenge throughout our history – about once every 300 years according to Bar-Ilan University political scientist, Daniel Elazar in his book, The Jewish Polity. This is what is contributing to the fears and insecurity of contemporary Jewry.

We are today, in the midst of such a transitional period – no longer living in the world of traditional rabbinic authority, nor have we created a completely satisfactory autonomous secular Jewish civilization. We are in a transitional period of Jewish history, searching for new models of Jewish polity and existence.

We see tensions of this challenge most clearly in the State of Israel today where the values of traditional rabbinic authority clash almost daily with the lives of people who desire democratic secular autonomy. At the same time, however, these "secular" Jews for the most part still make kiddush on Shabbat and festivals, and are unwilling to discard the current religious authorities because they see no alternative to safeguarding the Jewish tradition that they also value. It's much easier to project these tensions onto the external enemies that are more readily identifiable rather than deal with more difficult internal conflict.

What we need to create today is a positive agenda for Jewish life. Not merely a stance of defiance or defence against our enemies, but a creative Jewish response to the world we want. As one Jewish scholar has said. "Israelis typically abide a sense that they are making history – that their actions, their collective decisions, constitute a legacy for well or ill – that they are leaving for the many generations of Jews who will succeed them. American (and Canadian) Jews, too, would do well to become more conscious of their place in Jewish history." (Steven Cohen, Moment magazine, June 1987)

Our focus as Jews today must not only be the particular concerns of combating assimilation and anti-Semitism, but also the universal concerns we Jews share for creating socially just societies and protecting our global environment. We need to rethink the use of the considerable energies our many Jewish institutions are now expending and refocus them on promoting a creative expression of Jewish spiritual life. We need to translate our heritage of being "a holy nation and a kingdom of priests" into a contemporary expression of pluralistic democratic societies that allow all individuals their rightful expression of self and all cultures of holiness to flourish.

Lastman praised the "unique" school – the only Jewish day school for children with learning disabilities and attention deficit (hyperactivity) disorder in Canada – for "building confidence, in a caring, loving environment. It helps kids who can't deal with a regular school. It provides support, not pity."

He noted that She'arim has a capacity enrolment of 67 students, and there is a waiting list. "It's a crime there is a waiting list. Upper levels of government must get involved and provide more schools like She'arim.

"No child should be denied the chance to be educated as he needs," he asserted. "There should be schools like this all over the city."

A group of She'arim students put on a musical play, about a rich man who learned to share his wealth, that was received with applause and a standing ovation.

Three of this year's seven graduating students spoke about their experiences at She'arim. Brett Barrett compared himself to a building that had all the potential to be successful and profitable, but needed an expert hand to fine tune it.

Joyce Edery thanked the school for giving its students "the tools to allow me to get back on track, if things don't always go smoothly."

Aaron Orzech compared learning disabled children to stars in the night sky, who were not bright enough to be seen and appreciated. Thanks to She'arim, he said, "look into the sky tonight at the brightest star. That will be me."

Rabbi Joseph Kelman, a founder of She'arim, along with former Board of Jewish Education executive director Rabbi Itzhak Witty and the late Rabbi Sheldon Steinberg, chaplain of Jewish Family & Child Service and Mount Sinai Hospital, made special mention of Max Guttman, who died last month.

Guttman had been a longtime supporter of the school.

Plaques were presented to Ruth Friedman and her family and to Philip and Rose Shore, in appreciation for their generosity toward She'arim.

Lastman was presented with a doll replica of himself, holding a CN Tower in its arm.

Kesher program allows teens to participate in Israeli life

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Rebecca Kirsh knew she and fellow volunteers were getting through to their young Israeli students – despite the language barriers – when a group of about 10 youngsters came up to them at recess, grabbed their hands and indicated they wanted to play with them.

Kirsh, 19, and six other local students recently completed a three-month program called Kesher (the Hebrew word meaning "connection"), a new initiative of Canadian Young Judaea, UJA Federation and the Canada-Israel Experience Centre.

"Our daily involvement with the residents of Eilat has made an impact on both their lives and ours," wrote the seven Canadian students. "We have grown individually and as a group because of our independence and responsibilities.

"To many, Eilat is simply a tourist centre…we had the opportunity to see beyond the lobby doors," they wrote. "We had the privilege of working with new olim from the United States, Argentina, Brazil, Russia, the U.K. and Ethiopia. We even had the special opportunity of being guests at an Ethiopian bat mitzvah."

Kirsh, who graduated from the School of Liberal Arts in January, taught English to grades 4, 5 and 6 students at an Israeli elementary school during the morning. In the afternoon she worked at an after-school centre for children from dysfunctional families. She also taught a class to older women once a week.

"There were a few kids I really bonded with. There were a lot we helped."

For Kirsh, probably the biggest benefit of the program was being a participant, not just an observer, in Israeli life.

"Everyone was really welcoming. We'd walk down the street and say hi to people. We didn't just go for a few days, and leave."

For both Kirsh and Mike Lightstone, 18, a graduate of Thornlea Secondary School, the Kesher program represented their third trip to Israel.

Lightstone, who taught English in the same elementary school and also helped coach a youth basketball team, planned a couple of lessons about Canada. "Everything was a shock to them – the size of the country, the way we use water, the amount of space we have."

He said he learned a lot about life on this trip – through volunteering as well as through living on his own – and also about different aspects of Judaism.

As a Conservative Jew, he found neither secular Israelis nor Haredim "could understand where I was coming from."

Kirsch, who attended United Synagogue Day School until Grade 3 and the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto for grades 9 and 10, said that although she's not religious herself, she realized the importance of Judaism during this trip.

She feels Kesher offered "the best of both worlds" – an opportunity to tour as well as to teach English.

Patrilineal policy called divisive

Rabbi Goldstein. The vast majority of Reform rabbis, she said, require those with a non-Jewish mother to immerse in a mikvah if they are converting to Judaism.

A clarification of the guidelines, however, should remove some of the misconceptions, Rabbi Goldstein said.

Patrilineal descent, which has been controversial both within the Reform movement and outside of it, recognizes as Jewish the children of a Jewish father and non-Jewish mother, as long as they are educated as Jews and engage in appropriate acts of identification such as bar or bat mitzvot and confirmations.

Despite the need to re-examine how the patrilineal descent policy is interpreted, there does not appear to be any move to rescind it.

"I'm in a minority when it comes to being against the policy," Rabbi Goldstein said."It [patrilineal descent] creates further schisms within the Jewish comunity."

In part as a result of the policy, "I don't know what klal Yisrael [the people of Israel] is any more," she said.

The recommendations of the task force do not require a vote, but are up to CCAR officials to implement.

Patrilineal descent was adopted by the Reform rabbinate as a way to cope with increasing rates of interfaith marriage, and the need for rabbis to find a way to integrate into congregational life the growing number of children whose fathers, but not mothers are Jewish.

It has been embraced by the vast majority of Reform rabbis and congregants in the United States, but not so widely in Canada.

As a result of the policy, "the only place an intermarried couple can find a fully welcoming environment is in a Reform congregation," said Rabbi Samuel Stahl, chair of the task force that has made the recommendations.

The problem is, say Reform rabbis, there is no consistency about what it means to be educated Jewishly. While a Reform rabbi in Albuquerque, N.M., may accept as Jewish a teenager with a non-Jewish mother and Jewish father, who has had little Hebrew school education and never had a bar mitzvah ceremony, a Reform rabbi in New York, for example, might require the same teen to have celebrated all of the available Jewish rites of passage in order to be considered Jewish.

If that family then moves from Albuquerque to New York, and the teen wants to join a Reform temple youth group, he may not be considered Jewish.

Or later, when he approaches a Reform rabbi to officiate at his wedding to a Jewish woman, he may not be considered Jewish then, either, and he may be told that he has to convert to Judaism, even though he grew up considering himself part of the Jewish people.

There is no available estimate of the number of Reform Jews who are defined as Jewish by the patrilineal policy. The percentage of congregants in Reform temples who are intermarried ranges from as low as five percent to as high as 70 percent, said Dru Greenwood, director of outreach for the Reform movement's congregational arm.

The patrilineal policy – which is also in place in the Reconstructionist movement – has been blasted by Conservative and Orthodox leaders, since its implementation is an unacceptable break with the historical Jewish transmission of Jewishness through the mother.

A BOLD BEGINNING TO A NEW CAMPAIGN

Over 100 community leaders were treated to a preview of UJA Federation's upcoming Campaign for Fifty last week. And they loved what they saw, at UJA Federation's largest Leadership Launch in years.

The Campaign for Fifty's annual fundraising goal is $50 million by the year 2001 - $13.5 million more than the amount raised last year. UJA Federation is pledging to allocate the additional dollars raised to innovative projects in three areas: strengthening Jewish identity, protecting the vulnerable and rescuing Jews in danger.

Leadership Launch hosts Judy and Larry Tanenbaum.

"The time has come to move our plans off the shelf and take a quantum leap forward," said Brent Belzberg, who is chairing the campaign with Larry Tanenbaum. "We need to push our campaign to new heights so we can respond to the new realities of our community and to meet the needs that have been waiting far too long."

"People are very optimistic about the economic climate and they are very enthusiastic about UJA Federation's plans for the new money raised," said Tanenbaum. "Brent and I have been extremely encouraged by our donors' understanding that UJA Federation is the primary campaign in this community."

Leadership Launch participants viewed the new Campaign for Fifty video about the need for increased giving over three years. The upcoming campaign is being billed as a "bold beginning for a new Jewish century."

BLUEPRINT FOR THE FUTURE

In order to meet the needs of a new century, UJA Federation has set an ambitious annual fundraising goal of $50 million by the year 2001. The Campaign for Fifty is anchored by a blueprint which will direct additional funds raised for:

- Strengthening Jewish Identity -$6.5 million
- Assisting the Vulnerable - $4.3 million
- Rescuing Jews in Danger - $1.5 million

Among the Campaign for Fifty commitments are:

- Initiating new family education programs
- Increasing support for supplementary school education
- Ensuring access to Jewish education for severely challenged children
- Expanding homecare and outreach services for the frail elderly
- Increasing assistance for Toronto's Jewish poor
- Providing more services for abused women and their children
- Funding rescue efforts so that hundreds of thousands of Jews waiting to leave the former Soviet Union can make aliyah
- Providing additional support for teenagers who are making aliyah without their parents

YOUNG LEADERS LOOK AHEAD

It was a taste of Jewish Toronto tomorrow.

Last week's UJA Federation's Young Leadership Retreat brought together a select group of young men and women who spent their Sunday preparing themselves for leadership roles in the century ahead. More than 40 people participated in the one day program hosted by Judy and David Engel.

This year's retreat was about "dealing with the growing needs in our community," says Les Aaron who co-chairs the Young Leadership Cabinet with Lynn Kirshin. "It was a day for those already significantly involved with the Campaign, as well as many new leaders, to gain a more in-depth understanding of the issues affecting the community."

Government budget cuts, enhancing Jewish identity and immigration to Israel were just some of the hot topics covered. "These young people really have a stake in our community," says Judy Engel, UJA Federation's Women's Campaign Chair. "These are our future leaders and it's great to know they are so passionate about Jewish Toronto."

The program included several break-out sessions highlighting different areas of community concern. Dov Altman, a member of UJA Federation's Community Planning and Allocations Committee, who was on hand to lead one of the group discussions, was extremely impressed with the caliber of participants and their understanding of community issues. "We can be proud that these upcoming community leaders have such a deep commitment. It is our job now to educate them and arm them with the necessary tools."

A contingent of Toronto's young Jewish leaders is in Kiev and Israel this week on the Yachdav Young Leadership Mission. The conference, held every two years, brings hundreds from around the world face to face with pressing Jewish issues. "Yachdav is a great opportunity to meet young adults who share similar convictions," says David Beron, chair of Toronto's Yachdav '98. "It really is a once in a lifetime opportunity." The mission, which begins in Kiev, is visiting Jewish summer camps, participating in home visits with the elderly and paying tribute to victims of the Holocaust at Babi Yar. From there, it's off to Israel for touring, adventure and 50th anniversary celebrations.

UJA Federation's Young Leadership Cabinet, which sponsored the retreat, is an energetic network of 23-40 year old men and women who are distinguished by their commitment to Jewish life. The cabinet's four components are Young Business Network (YBN), Young Professionals Network (YPN), Leadership Development Program (LDP) and Hands on Toronto (HOT). For more information, please contact Avi Benlolo at 631-5688.

UPDATE '98

UJA Federation recently offered financial professionals the most up to date data on current issues at the annual Update conference sponsored by the Professional Advisory Council of the Endowment Fund. Nearly 250 participants were briefed by 24 speakers on topics such as Philanthropy and the UJA Federation Challenge and Charitable Giving into the Millennium. It was the best-attended Update conference in years. Pictured here are David Goldstein (in photo at right), incoming Chair of the Endowment Board of Trustees and Marshall Eglenick (far left) discussing conference fine points with David Ogus.

BJE PROGRAMS REACH RECORD NUMBERS

UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education drew unprecedented student and professional participation this year for programs surrounding Israel's 50th anniversary.

"One of the most important values for our Jewish children is love of Israel," says Rabbi Dr. Jeremiah Unterman, the BJE's Executive Director. "We are greatly gratified at the deep involvement of our schools in these unique activities."

Nearly 1200 Jewish school children participated in a Musical Salute to Israel at Ontario Place during the Israel at 50 Festival earlier this year. The BJE and Bathurst Jewish Centre coordinated the presentation which included 18 choirs, 18 dance groups, a drama troupe and a flag presentation.

When Toronto celebrated Israel's 50th anniversary on Yom Ha'atzmaut at the National Trade Centre, over 200 Jewish day school students in the Israel at 50 Children's Ensemble made the event "A Night of a Lifetime."

In its inaugural year, the Jewish Identity Contest, a unique BJE initiative to enhance knowledge of Zionism and Judaism, attracted over 500 students across Canada. The contest, which has both a written and oral component, covers among other subjects, the Jewish Life Cycle and Jewish holidays.

This year's annual Bible Contest, testing the biblical expertise of Jewish students from grade 5 to OAC in day and supplementary schools included a special emphasis on Israel. Three hundred Toronto students took part in the first round and 100 of them moved on to the national finals in Ottawa. The national winners will proceed to the world finals in Israel next Yom Ha'atzmaut.

Over 1,200 Jewish school children performed at the Israel at 50 Festival on May 24th.

Sing a song for Israel: The Israel at 50 Chidlren's Ensemble celebrate the country's anniversary at "Night Of A Lifetime."

SPECIAL NEEDS GET SPECIAL ATTENTION

The Board of Jewish Education of UJA Federation has hired an expert on teaching children with special needs. Dori Levine, who is acting as a consultant to the BJE, is developing materials for teachers to work with children who have special needs – both in general and Jewish studies. In addition, specialized training for teachers at the pre-school and early grade level is underway to identify children with special needs.

Toronto's Jewish education system, according to BJE Executive Director, Rabbi Dr. Jeremiah Unterman, continues to be a preeminent model in North America. Established in 1949, the Board of Jewish Education is the central community agency for Jewish education, providing services to over 50 different schools and more than 16,000 day and supplementary students.

UJA Federation, through the BJE, supports subsidies for families who cannot afford the full cost of day school tuition. UJA Federation dollars also funds continuity grants for supplementary education and programs for specific educational needs.

FOCUS ON FAMILY EDUCATION

Creating a network of family education services is a priority for the Board of Jewish Education. Through family education, family members participate in Jewish learning and celebrate Jewish holidays together. "The only way to ensure Jewish continuity is to involve the entire family in the experience of Jewish learning," says Yael Seliger, Director of Educational Services at the BJE. "Gone are the days when parents drop off their children for a few hours of Jewish education a week – this new approach is the way of the future."

Two years ago, the BJE launched an intensive training program for day and supplementary school educators in Jewish family education. Last year, in the program's second phase, a partnership was created for educators, rabbis, and other community members working to implement Jewish family initiatives, often begun by supplementary schools.

Plans to further develop the partnership will be implemented in the new school year.

The BJE strives to provide educators with cutting edge teaching strategies and materials, through professional development, consultation services to affiliated schools, workshops and curriculum development.

This year, the BJE organized the largest gathering of educators in its history. Over 1300 teachers and administrators participated in day long professional development sessions centered on Israel's 50th anniversary.

The BJE houses three resource areas for Toronto educators: a teacher centre for the development of classroom creative materials; a media centre, with over 2000 Hebrew and English video tapes and a library housing over 10,000 titles, which is expanding its collection of books and CD ROMS.

On Campus

Kol Hastudentim unites Jewish student leaders

By ALEXANDRA PRASOW
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Jewish college and university students from 10 campuses recently gathered from all over Ontario for Kol Hastudentim's second annual Mega-Leadership Conference.

Kol Hastudentim is a non-denominational, pluralistic, student-run Jewish organization. The four-day conference was held amid the tall trees, rocking waves and biting mosquitoes of Maple Lake Resort near Parry Sound.

It marked a turning point for the student organization, whose name in Hebrew means both inclusiveness and voice, as Kol Hastudentim's current executive stepped down and this year's leaders were welcomed.

Approximately 60 students and recent graduates from diverse Jewish backgrounds participated in workshops that focused on leadership, Jewish culture and religion.

"The weekend was an opportunity for Jews of all backgrounds to come together and celebrate their Jewishness," said Heath Applebaum, the newly installed president and chair of Kol Hastudentim.

Seminars and workshops at the conference were led by both students and other speakers from the Jewish community.

On Saturday night, participants celebrated Lag b'Omer by dancing around, with twirling sparklers lighting the darkened lodge. Then Stacia Benovitch, director of Hillel in Ottawa, shared stories about her recent trip abroad with the March of the Living.

Other sessions included a speech by Jehudi Kinar, Israeli consul general for Toronto and Western Canada; a discussion of pluralism with Zac Kaye of Jewish Campus Services; and a talk on liberal Judaism with Rabbi Jeremy Schwartz of Kolel. Michael Soberman and Leanne Rosen of the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) ran sessions on programming and student and staff relations respectively.

Robbie Diamond, also from CJC, led a session on the Ne'eman Commission. Rabbi Benjie Jacoby of the Jewish Education Program, continuing on a theme he started at the Kol Hastudentim ski trip in December, led a workshop on the role of chesed in Jewish life.

One of the highlights was a talk by documentary film producer Simcha Jacobovici. Once a student activist, Jacobovici shared those experiences. He also spoke about the Menmasseh, a group of people near Burma who have a Jewish identity and want to move to Israel. Some believe that the name Menmasseh is a derivative of Menashe, one ot the lost tribes of Israel, he said. The group was inspired by Jacobovici, who stressed the power of each individual to make a difference.

In an impromptu speech, Jessica Faith, a conference participant, talked about the diversity of Jewish life and urged others to be more accepting of all Jews, regardless of denomination.

"I realized I wasn't alone," she commented. "People said to me, 'I'm glad you mentioned that, because I feel that way too.'" Faith's words sum up one of the goals of Kol Hastudentim – to provide students with an avenue to explore their Judaism within the context of community.

Canadian Jewish Congress, UJA Federation, Jewish Education Program, Hillel/Jewish Campus Services and private donors helped support this conference.

UBC student publishes first book of poetry

By SIDURA LUDWIG
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Like many other students, first year University of British Columbia student Abby Werner is travelling to Europe this summer; however, the newly published 18-year-old poet not only plans to sightsee, she plans to seek creative inspiration.

"I think that seeing new people and places will help shape my future and my writing," Werner said in a recent telephone interview from Vancouver.

Werner, who plans to focus on English and women's studies at school, has just published her first book of poetry, Diluting the Rain (Pink Flamingo Works). She recently launched it at a cafe in Vancouver where she invited her friends to read and perform their poetry. She ended the evening by performing her own.

Werner began seriously writing poetry after attending a performance poetry reading when she was 15. "I asked the organizer if I could try reading some of my poetry, and he said sure. He didn't even ask to see my work," she said.

Werner found the performance poetry community to be supportive and encouraging. "A lot of my friends are writers and I'm lucky to be able to share my poetry with them and to get feedback."

At the same time, she describes performing her poetry as sometimes scary. "When you're reading your poetry, you're sharing all your feelings. [When I perform], I try to find poems that aren't as personal." she said.

Werner's poetry is filled with both lyricism and imagery. Diluting the Rain explores the themes of love, women's identity, women's strength and the writing practice. It also incorporates food images, making the poetry multi-sensual.

Werner describes her creative process as a journey. "If an image or a phrase doesn't come to me right away, then I try to write a few words or images and submerge myself in the image and feeling. I go through the path of words. If it's working, then I go back and pare down the language."

Werner put together Diluting the Rain when she saw many performance poets were putting out chap-books of poetry. She had done poetry readings at various cafes and bookstores through Vancouver.

"It was time for me to get my voice out there," she said.

While her poetry does not explore Judaism, she hopes that her summer trip will inspire her to delve into her Jewish roots.

"I'll be travelling to Israel, France and London," Werner said. "I need to find something in my religion that inspires me. My poems come from emotions and what affects me. Nothing has affected me yet in my religion."

Werner encourages aspiring poets to actively seek their inspiration. "Watch things around you with both eyes open and closed. Try to find every angle and then look in the bizarre, small, easily missed spots. Try to taste every aspect of what you feel, of what you experience, what you see, and write down a slice of that and the path that got you there."

Diluting the Rain is only available in Vancouver at Magpie Book, Black Sheep Books and soon at Women in Print. Those outside of Vancouver interested in receiving a copy of the book can contact Werner via e-mail at [monteray@axionet.com.

Time of Your Life

Growing number of retired men are volunteering

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Every Monday, Tuesday and Thursday, Bernard Freedman, 73, gets on the subway and heads down to Mount Sinai Hospital's (MSH) dental department, where he spends the morning working.

A denturist for 50 years, Freedman retired eight years ago, but for the past five years, he's been volunteering in MSH's dental department doing what he knows best.

Freedman is one of a growing number of retired men who are offering their services as volunteers. He said he became a Mount Sinai volunteer because he thought he could provide a service to the dental clinic.

"I decided I'm still pretty good with my hands. I made many a denture in my day. I thought I could be of help in my chosen profession."

He helps the five new clinic dentists by doing repair jobs, and he can fill in temporarily for the dentists with denture patients, he said.

Freedman finds the work and professional collaboration extremely rewarding. "You're forever learning new things. I thought I knew everything after being in the business for 50 years."

Most Friday mornings, you'll find Peter, who prefers to be known by his first name only, on a bicycle, pedaling from his home to MSH, where he, too, is a volunteer.

A retired public health engineer, Peter, 74, decided to volunteer "to give something to the community" because he had time, he said. "I'm Jewish. It [MHS] seemed a natural place to go."

Peter works in the surgical unit as well as in the podiatry clinic, where he has helped out Friday afternoons for the past five years. His clinic responsibilities include drawing charts, preparing treatment rooms, booking appointments, registering patients and "keeping them happy while they're waiting," he said.

"I find that I get a good deal more out of volunteer work than I expected," Peter said. "You form a bond with other volunteers. You get to know professional staff. I get a lot of appreciation from hospital staff. There is a lot of personal reward in volunteering that I didn't count on."

He and Freedman make up a group of about 15 to 20 male volunteers over the age of 50 who were recently identified as a unique group by MHS director of volunteer services, Joanne Fine-Schwebel.

This group of men who are retired from high level business and professional backgrounds are now providing a valuable service to the hospital, Fine-Schwebel said. "They brought with them a whole group of skills that many of our traditional volunteers didn't have."

She said that while a few female volunteers in the retirement age bracket fit this profile, the majority are homemakers and younger female volunteers, "young mothers or women working part time who want to make a contribution to the hospital."

She said that among the 500 MSH volunteers, there are few males in the 30 to 50 age range, because they are not able to give the minimum of one day a week requirement. She noted that historically men have not been very involved in direct service volunteer work, which was traditionally a woman's domain.

However, the group of retired men is dedicated and take their volunteer responsibilities very seriously, Fine-Schwebel said.

"They were looking for ways to involve themselves, to use their skills and make a contribution. They treat their volunteer work like a job. I'm impressed by their dedication."

They work in a lot of clinical areas in the hospital, such as the day clinics, eye and podiatry clinics, as well as in intense environments like the surgical and emergency units or departments that draw on their professional skills.

For example, David Cappe, a retired pharmacist helps in the pharmacy clinic twice a week.

Ross Irvine, a retired floor trader at the stock exchange, volunteers twice a week in the information booth. Joe Picovsky works in admitting, while businessperson Arthur Rubinoff developed a training program for co-op students in the emergency department and now works in the surgical waiting room as a lay liaison between the medical staff and the family and friends of the patients in surgery.

Syrelle Bernstein, director of volunteer services at Baycrest Geriatric Centre said there are some 200 retired men among the 2,500-member volunteer core who are involved in direct service programs. She said Baycrest requires a six-month commitment from volunteers, but the amount of weekly volunteer time varies from daily work to as little as one hour a week.

She noted that retired males are involved in a whole gamut of activities that include friendly visiting, palliative care, feeding assistance, escorting clients to and from programs, running programs and religious services, helping on outings and administrative work.

"Male volunteers of retirement age can be found everywhere throughout the centre,"she said. Many of them belong to the Men's Service Club and assist in service programs sponsored by the Men's service Club such as the Sunday brunch program, she added.

Social group for the grieving

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

"I grieve privately," says Kirsch. "It took me over a year to think about a move outside of my grief."

Not wanting to become involved with a grieving group, Kirsch was invited by his friend Beverley Bobbin to a social gathering of Widows or Widowers (WOW). This group provides a support system for those who wish to get on with their lives, but find that they are no longer comfortable or fit in with their married friends.

Bobbin spearheaded WOW after her husband died. Eleven people came out to the first meeting. Today, there are more than 60 members.

"Support from friends and relatives is very strong during the first year after a spouse's death, but then they expect you to get on with your life," says Kirsch. "WOW was a step in the right direction – a social group where people can meet, make friends and be with others who have experienced the loss of a loved one."

Once a month, three or four members of WOW volunteer to plan an outing, such as visits to the Royal Ontario Museum, the Art Gallery of Ontario, a night at the races, a trip to St. Jacobs, dinner, theatre, brunches, a Chanukah party and an annual party in honor of the forming of the group.

"Some of our members enjoy walking but don't want to walk alone, so they got together and formed a regular walkers' group. They meet at various locations around the city every second Sunday morning."

Kirsch, who says he is a "doer, not a position person," emphasizes that WOW is not a singles group.

"Attending an event is pressure-free and an enjoyable time – something one normally wouldn't have done because there wasn't anyone to do it with."

There are more widows than widowers in the group, says Kirsch, noting that Canadian statistics indicate that there are considerably more widows in Canada than widowers.

WOW's members are between 45 and their late 60s and meet strictly for friendship.

"The group has given me something to look forward to with some meaning and purpose. We get together as people – not necessarily male or female."

WOW is a non-affiliated and a non-profit group. Kirsch says that they are anxious to make synagogues and organizations aware of their programs, which take place mid-week and weekends.

"I believe that this is the only group of its kind here in Toronto," he says. "Most members work, but weekends can be lonely. It's nice to have people to do things with."

For more information, call Kirsch at 636-6101 or Nelson at 905-889-1419.

Guide helps people to choose a retirement home

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Social workers are frequently asked which retirement home or long-term care facility would be most appropriate for a parent or loved one.

"It is one of the most difficult questions to answer," says Esther Goldstein, who has worked as a hospital social worker for eight years, primarily with the geriatric population. She is currently employed at Sunnybrook Health Science Centre.

Goldstein, who has a degree in social work from Ryerson Polytechnic University, says that much of her work has involved counseling people about relocating their loved ones to facilities, and assisting with the placement process.

"With the often long wait for nursing homes, people in ever-increasing numbers, [have begun] to turn to the private sector to provide care for the elderly who are too sick or dependent to return home."

Recognizing the difficulties in selecting the most appropriate facility, Goldstein sent detailed questionnaires to numerous residences and compiled a publication titled A Comprehensive Guide to Retirement

Seniors hit hardest by health care changes: Ziemba

BY ADAM BELLO
Special to The CJN

Seniors could be hit hardest by current changes to Ontario's health care system, according to a former New Democratic Party cabinet minister.

In a recent talk to the Cranbrooke Friendship Club of the United Jewish People's Order, Elaine Ziemba said federal and provincial efforts to cut budgets could lead to poorer quality in health services available.

She said measures taken by the current government of Ontario, including the possibility of privatization for some health services next year, are contributing to the creation of a two-tier system.

"There are definite changes happening, and there will be a price to pay," said Ziemba, who was minister of citizenship in charge of senior issues during the 1990-95 government of Bob Rae. "We are at a turning point in health care, and something has to be done."

Ziemba said that while 1998 will be a transitional year, effective April 1, 1999, private sector agencies will be allowed to compete for health care contracts with not-for-profit counterparts.

"It worries me because we are making public health needs something that can be bidded on," said Ziemba.

"This is creating two-tiers of class, based on affordability to the individual.

"All these efforts are uncoordinated. During the NDP years, there were buildings being built (for senior housing) and a long-term care plan. Today, health care suffers from poor planning.

"Hospital staffing is becoming unstable. Qualified nurses are leaving the province, while casual, part time, and unregistered staff are taking on these roles. Waiting time in emergency rooms is becoming longer, and there is not enough beds for these and for long term care needs."

Ziemba said the apparent strategy of the Harris government – an early discharge of seniors from hospital to continue recovery with a care-giver from home – may be a more beneficial and cost effective process.

However, she said, unless seniors have their own medical/drug plan, they will have to pay for all the related costs that would have been covered under the Canada Health Act if they had remained in hospital. She said under Ontario's Home Help program, the recipient will have to pay a portion of the care-giver's salary.

"There are no facts to prove care in the home will be better for the individual. In fact, there are many cases where it may do more harm than good by bringing them out of the hospital.

"The assumption is that a family member or friend will help the person recover faster if they are in a familiar setting, but the indirect costs are there," she said. "The person acting as a care-giver loses time to earn taxable income, and possibly gets runs down, becoming ill and requiring someone to take care of them. Ultimately, it becomes a societal drain."

Ziemba said seniors should regularly communicate with their MPPs and municipal councillors regarding the dissatisfaction they may have with present health care.

Homes in the Greater Toronto Area, a resource directory to assist seniors and their families in choosing a retirement living facility.

"Even those of us who work in the field and know something about many of the facilities cannot say which is the best place to send someone. It would be too presumptuous to make such a decision for a person we do not know," she says.

"Instead, we suggest that you become an informed consumer, so that you, who know the person, can help them to make such a significant choice."

The guide, she says, is to help make a difficult decision easier by giving individuals as much information as possible.

"It is to be used in conjunction with your own subjective perspective, taking into consideration location, cost, ethnic inclination, languages spoken and other details."

She notes that the information was provided by each centre, "and I assume that each place responded accurately."

She emphasizes that no decision should be made without visiting the facility, or preferably a few facilities. "Meet the staff, sample a meal, speak with residents and their families."

Along with a comprehensive listing of the centres, which includes special features, residence information, staffing, health services, accommodation, dining services, amenities and activities, services included in the fee, and rental information, the guide also provides information on numerous topics such as wills and powers of attorney, tips on choosing a facility, how to make the transition easier, special needs facilities, as well as resources and support agencies.

The guide has been distributed free of charge to numerous social agencies in the geographic areas covered in the book. "The response has been incredible," she says.

Goldstein will be updating the guide annually. Advertising and private funds paid for the production and early distribution of the guide.

The guide is available at several hospital gift shops. For more information or to order a guide, call 457-6554, or fax 905-761-6264.

The Internet: 'A library full of people'

By JOYCE SINGER
Special to The CJN

Seniors (55 plus), are among the fastest growing communities on the Internet, according to John Nemanic, president of Internet Direct. "At our free HTML seminars...out of 30 people, at least 20 are over the age of 50!"

The CJN asked a few Jewish seniors about their personal adventures in cyberland:

Torontonian David Ibbetson, 64, produces the weekly newsletter for his housing co-op. A trained statistical mathematician, he was forced to retire in the early '80s for health reasons.

"If you live on a fixed income, everything's expensive. But the best things about the Internet are the friends I've made. (While the worst is 'SPAM' – unsolicited e-mail advertisements). "I was at a dinner recently with 14 Net pals...about five of us were Jewish.

"The Internet is like a reference library full of people and information who know about any conceivable subject and are ready and willing to help inquirers. With rare exceptions, I've found it a friendly place. The Internet suits me perfectly, since I can read and write e-mail and browse at my own speed."

He recommends these Web sites: "The Jerusalem Post, which I remember when it was the Palestine Post. And the Maven Web site, the 'Ultimate' Jewish/Israel index", [www.maven.co.il]

Alisa Aiken Abbey, 60, a retired nurse who lives in Hornby Island, B.C., immediately signed up for Internet access, when her younger son moved to England four years ago.

"The best part is the ability to maintain contact with my Jewishness in an area with few Jews.

"If you have a good Internet Service Provider (ISP), it really is not that hard to learn, especially if you know the computer first. But if not, it's still not that difficult to get wired.

"E-mail is the reason we got it in the first place. E-mail was almost instantaneous, versus two or three weeks via snail (regular) mail. It's reasonably priced considering that I have had a lot of trouble with Canada Post losing mail. Now I buy fewer stamps. I just wish I could send packages through the Net!"

Phyllis Gelb, 57, an elementary school secretary in South Lake Tahoe, Calif. says, "The initial investment, of course, was expensive, but I find it worth every penny. I use the Internet for paying my bills, tracking my investments, shopping, playing (online) Scrabble, checking weather, news, travel and stock info, and keeping in touch with family and friends.

"I spend about two hours a day on the Net. Addicted? I would definitely be at a loss without my computer. I check my e-mail at work whenever I have a free moment. If I had to go back to writing checks and licking envelopes I'd be very upset.

"I love corresponding by e-mail because I'm on the phone all day long and the last thing I want to do when I get home is talk on the phone.

"Last December, when I couldn't find my Jewish cookbook, I used the Net to look up a recipe for kasha varnishkes to take to a Chanukah party.

"There's an enormous variety of things I am interested in, readily accessible. I use the Net to research Judaica, history and genealogy mainly. The Kulanu e-mail list actively works with scattered groups returning to Judaism. I also enjoy reading international and/or Jewish newspaper and magazine Web sites for news, and I belong to a few e-mail joke lists.

"I spend a minimum of four hours a day on the Net and am definitely addicted. It's a fantastic way to learn, exchange ideas, keep in touch with family and friends. Some are from as far away as Australia!

"As people grow older and have diverse medical problems, the Web is a great way to keep up with new developments, and you can share ideas with people you would not otherwise meet.

It's evident that for golden-agers, the Internet is a great equalizer, giving a global voice to their specific interests and concerns. Senior Cybernauts – a force to be reckoned with in the new millennium.

Minyan sought for Kirkland Lake

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Toronto-area lawyer is looking to round up a minyan for the rededication of the Kirkland Lake Hebrew Cemetery July 2.

Sydney Moscoe, who spent most of his childhood in Kirkland Lake, is planning the ceremony with Eddie Duke, one of the few remaining Jews in the Northern Ontario town, about 380 miles north of Toronto.

"It will be a chance for people who go, to at least say Kaddish with a minyan," said Moscoe.

At its height, the Kirkland Lake Jewish community had about 125 Jewish families. Lawyer Harry Moscoe, Syd's father, had moved his young family from Toronto to the growing mining town in 1936 on the advice of his brother who was then living in Timmins, about 90 miles away.

"These towns were booming in the '30s," said Moscoe.

At 65, he has fond memories of Kirkland Lake, where he lived until his late teens (except for 1941-44, when his father took a job in Montreal with the Canadian Jewish Congress war efforts committee).

"I think Kirkland Lake was the greatest place I could have grown up in," said Moscoe.

On the whole, he felt the Jewish community was well respected in the ethnically mixed town. He recalls seeing a picture of a local parade in the 1930s, with the rabbi leading a contingent from the Jewish community.

There was a synagogue, a Hebrew school, a chevrah kadishah and, at one time, a kosher butcher and a Jewish men's softball team. The synagogue was sold in 1971; its Ark is now in the chapel of Beth Tikvah Synagogue in Toronto.

When kosher meat was not available locally, Moscoe's mother would phone or write to a kosher butcher in Toronto, who would send a shipment by train, packed in dry ice. "Sometimes in the summer the only thing that arrived without being spoiled was the salami."

The Moscoes moved back to Toronto in 1954, three years after Sydney moved here to take his last year of high school at Harbord Collegiate Institute.

Before that, he attended Kirkland Lake Collegiate, which is holding its 75th anniversary reunion this July.

The forthcoming reunion inspired Moscoe and Duke to plan the rededication of the cemetery, located in Krugerdorf, some 20 miles south of Kirkland Lake.

Duke, a widower and the photographer who took Moscoe's bar mitzvah pictures, is one of only a handful of people who make up today's Jewish community in Kirkland Lake. The tiny Jewish populations in nearby Englehart and Cobalt are gone, said Moscoe.

The cemetery, which is tended by a local couple, dates back to 1908, when Hyme Jacobson died at the age of 19. A new immigrant, he was travelling up the Blanche River toward Krugerdorf when his canoe overturned, said Moscoe.

Anyone who would like further information about the rededication can contact Moscoe at 905-831-2333 until June 30. The rededication will take place at 10:30 on July 2. At 9:30, participants will meet outside the Journey's End Motel in Kirkland Lake to leave for the cemetery. Moscoe noted that the cemetery is difficult to find, as it is no longer marked with a highway sign.

JNF marks 50th, Holocaust

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — The recent Hamilton Jewish National Fund (JNF), Negev Tribute Dinner, titled From Dreams to Reality, was a celebration of the 50th anniversary of the State of Israel and a tribute to the survivors of the Holocaust.

It was fitting, said JNF co-chair Hilda Rosen in her opening remarks, that the survivors were chosen as honorees on the occasion of Israel's 50th anniversary.

"Tonight we celebrate life and that rare courage our honorees...have displayed every day of their lives. We are ever mindful of those who are no longer with us – through you, their spirits live on – as Israel always has and always will," Rosen told the 400 guests at Adas Israel Synagogue.

David Sultan, Israel's ambassador to Ottawa, said "as we celebrate the establishment of the State of Israel 50 years ago, it is a sad thought that Israel was established a few years too late to save the victims of the Holocaust."

The anniversary was about remembering, he said. "We owe it to those who perished and to those who survived. We owe it to the future and to the future of the world, so that this will never happen again."

In his brief address, Sultan noted with pride that despite its many problems, not least security, Israel is a democracy.

"We have every reason to be proud of our achievements, but they would not have been possible without the support of you and Jews around the world."

Holocaust Remembrance Committee chair Gary Frydman accepted a plaque on behalf of the survivors, and a special presentation was made to JNF co-chair Claire Waxman who is moving to Toronto.

B.C. anti-racism activist loses libel lawsuit

By PETER CAULFIELD
Pacific Correspondent

VICTORIA — A Salmon Arm woman has won a libel suit against an anti-racism activist, despite her description by a B.C. Supreme Court judge as a "missionary for anti-Semitism and pro-white racism."

In a judgment released here May 20, Supreme Court Judge Dermod Owen-Flood ruled in favor of Eileen Pressler and her husband, Claus, in their suit against Salmon Arm anti-racism advocate David Lethbridge and Westcom TV Group Ltd.

Eileen Pressler is founder of the Council on Public Affairs (CPA) and editor of the CPA Digest, a newsletter produced and circulated in the early 1990s.

The broadcast dealt with rumors of construction on property owned by the Presslers on the Trans-Canada Highway near Salmon Arm.

The broadcast repeated local speculation that the property was to be used not as a retirement home, as the Presslers maintained, but as a paramilitary training ground and venue for meetings of right-wing groups.

The judge found that Lethbridge, founder of the Salmon Arm Coalition Against Racism (SACAR), "repeated defamatory rumors in the broadcast which he knew or ought to have known were untrue."

Owen-Flood awarded Eileen Pressler $1,500 from Lethbridge and $10,000 from Westcom. Claus Pressler was awarded $10,000 from Lethbridge and $50,000 from Westcom.

At the same time, the judge found that some of the views expressed in the CPA Digest "go beyond what is acceptable in a free and democratic society. They engender hatred of identifiable groups in violation of the Criminal Code. Thus they are beyond the pale of the law."

War crimes case winds up

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Final arguments will take place July 2 and July 3 here in Federal Court to determine whether Montrealer Vladimir Katriuk will keep his Canadian citizenship. Katriuk is accused of concealing his membership in a Ukrainian SS battalion in order to come to Canada in 1951.

The arguments will culminate months of sporadic proceedings involving expert testimony from academics, trips to interview witnesses in Russia, Ottawa and Toronto, and friends of Katriuk who served with him in the battalion.

If the Federal Court denaturalizes Katriuk, he will almost certainly be deported back to Ukraine.

Last month, Katriuk, a retired beekeeper who spends most of his time in Ormstown, testified for two days in Federal Court and denied ever being asked what he did during the war years when he was interviewed by Canadian Embassy officials in Paris some 47 years ago.

Katriuk's position was supported by his French-born wife, Maria, and two other men who befriended Katriuk and maintained in court that they were also not questioned about their wartime activities when they applied to come to Canada.

The Crown is arguing that Katriuk was indeed asked about his past since such questions were automatic at that time and on the application forms.

Watching TV? On the phone? You can still work out...

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — There are parts of our bodies we can exercise even when doing such things as watching TV, talking on the phone or brushing our teeth, according to Anne Cho, a Mount Sinai Hospital physiotherapist.

Cho was a panelist at the last of the three-part health lecture series at the Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC), which drew nearly a full house recently at the Leah Posluns Theatre.

At medical checkups, which she heartily recommended, people should ask their physicians gender specific and age specific questions, said Dr. Anne Biringer, director of the Family Medicine Centre at Mount Sinai Hospital.

Studies do not bear out that the wealthy have less illness than the poor, Biringer said. There is a difference in the rates of illness that does not conform to class lines, she said, adding that even within the same job classification there are differences.

Asking the audience to eat more fruits and vegetables, Frances Berkoff, a consulting dietitian at the hospital, said the average person has consumed 47,460 meals by age 40, so food has an important impact on health.

Fruits and vegetables, along with vitamin C, are an important source of antioxidants and lower the risk of cataracts. Leafy greens are rich in folic acid, and women who consume enough folic acid before they conceive will lower birth defect risk.

Lycopine, found in tomatoes, red grapefruit and watermelon, lowers the risk of heart disease. Soy milk has less calcium and Vitamin D than regular milk, so she advised buying soy milk that has been fortified with these elements.

People who are socially isolated have a death rate one to four times higher than average, said psychiatrist Dr. Jonathan Hunter, head of the hospital's psycho-social unit.

Women who have a companion when they give birth have half the length of time of delivery.

Those with a high-pressure type of personality do much better when they have group therapy following a heart attack; only 13 percent suffer a recurrence, compared with 30 percent, who do not have group therapy.

There are not as many support groups for men with life threatening diseases as for women, Hunter said, but he spoke of the valuable results when a group of men whose wives had cancer got together and talked freely about their fears.

The series was sponsored by Mount Sinai Hospital, the BJC and the Jewish Women's Federation. Micki Moore was moderator for all three.

Genetic Disorders

Hadassah researchers have pioneered a new gene therapy technique to introduce healthy genes into bone marrow cells using a harmless virus.

This procedure, if successful in human trials, could eventually be used to cure genetic disorders, including certain inherited cancers and thalassemia. The groundwork for this procedure was developed over the past decade by Hebrew University-Hadassah Medical School's Prof. Ariella Oppenheim, who introduced healthy genes into bone marrow cells using a genetically engineered SV40 virus.

Dr. Deborah Rund of Hadassah-University Hospital's hematology department partnered with her by testing a multi-drug resistant gene. According to Rund, bone marrow is the target cell for the cure of many types of disease, and previous strategies were not penetrating efficiently. In the lab, Oppenheim's SV40 virus penetrates human bone marrow cells quickly and efficiently.

The next step is to take human bone marrow and introduce it into immunologically depressed mice as a lab model.

York Central may face cutbacks

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — York Central Hospital in Richmond Hill faces the prospect of cutting its programs and closing beds unless the Ontario Ministry of Health provides additional funding, Frank Lussing, president and chief executive officer warns.

The hospital's budget committee is meeting in the next two weeks to consider such moves, he said.

His warning comes in the wake of the announcement by Ontario Health Minister Elizabeth Witmer that $186.1 million is being provided to expand and renovate 15 Toronto hospitals.

"In the 905 area outside of Toronto, we are anxiously awaiting an announcement of what will be done for the high growth areas," Lussing said.

"We are expected to double in size in the next five years to cope with a resident population increase of 40 percent," he said.

Among its new burdens will be the transfer of 20 percent of North York General Hospital Branson Division's patients when Branson closes in two or three years.

The major addition to York Central will be a $23- or $24-million dedicated continuing care building including adult day care, a chronic kidney dialysis unit and 100 beds for long-term care.

The $27.4 million allotted for expansion and renovation to North York General on Leslie Street is still under negotiation because more is needed said President Murray Mackenzie.

It is hoped that the emergency department at the Branson Division will be opened at night again as soon as enough nurses are recruited, particularly from the United States, he said.

The $4.1 million allotted to the Branson Division will be used to convert it to an ambulatory care centre.

The plans at North York General are to double the emergency department and have twice as many treatment areas by the end of 2001.

Netanyahu rejects criticism of Jerusalem moves

By JAY BUSHINSKY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Rejecting foreign criticism of his government's plan to transform Jerusalem into "a 21st-century metropolis," Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu last Sunday said U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright had jumped to hasty conclusions instead of "checking with me first.

"This is not a change of status from the political standpoint," Netanyahu told a news conference shortly after the administrative expansion had won the cabinet's unanimous approval.

He said he was astounded by the negative foreign reactions, describing them as "empty balloons." As for the American reaction, Netanyahu said he hopes his discussion with Albright succeeded in clarifying Israel's position.

He added that he had conferred last week with U.S. Ambassador Edward Walker about the destruction of illegal housing in Jerusalem, regardless of whether it is built by Jews or Arabs, and that the subject of the metropolitan plan did not come up, despite the fact that it was first broached in the cabinet before he met with Walker.

The plan would annex some land around Jerusalem and create a "Greater Jerusalem" under an umbrella municipality that would coordinate administrative powers with nearby towns.

The towns mentioned in the plan include Givat Ze'ev and Ma'aleh Adumin in the territories, as well as Mevasseret Zion and other towns inside the Green Line.

Yet to be determined are the exact areas to be covered, the responsibilities of the umbrella authority, and who would have the right to vote in Jerusalem municipal elections.

The next step is for the Interior Ministry to prepare a detailed plan for both the annexation and the creation of the umbrella authority. The plan is to be submitted to the cabinet after Aug. 1 and to the Knesset when it reconvenes in September.

Interior Minister Eli Suissa met with Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert for preliminary discussions on the plan's details, according to Israel Radio.

In an interview Sunday on NBC's Meet the Press, Albright said she told Netanyahu that his announced expansion plans for Jerusalem were being viewed "as something that was not helpful to the peace process." She said Netanyahu "clarified" his intentions as being municipal in nature.

However, when asked about the cabinet decision, Albright said, "Anything that is done at this point on something that is a final-status issue cannot really be helpful, when we are in a period...of very intensive and constructive dialogue" to restart the peace process.

"Right now, there are talks going on at a variety of levels," Albright said. "I've said many times that unilateral acts of any kind at this point do not help."

Olmert, who shared the podium with Netanyahu, justified the idea of incorporating several of the towns on the city's western periphery into a single super-municipality on the grounds that "there is no justification for so many local councils and their respective bureaucracies and budgets."

On the other hand, he stressed that only those communities with land reserves on which housing can be built will be annexed. He excluded Mevasseret Zion from this category and said he did not intend to annex it.

Netanyahu accused the Palestinian Authority (PA) of whipping up overseas opinion against the scheme and implying that this was done in retaliation for Israel's successful campaign to thwart its attempt to win UN recognition of its purported status as a "virtual state."

"We are not trying to unravel the Oslo accords," he said. But he charged that the PA violated them not only by its abortive UN initiative, but also by trying to infiltrate its security personnel into the city and setting up offices.

Netanyahu insisted that there is no political significance to the plan's timing. Originally, he had intended to present it in conjunction with the annual Jerusalem Day festivities, but it was impossible to prepare it by then, he said.

At the same time, the underlying objective is to expand Jerusalem's industrial base by introducing more high-tech firms and "turning it into Israel's Silicon Valley," he said.

Declaring that the plan's benefits would accrue to the city's Arabs as well as to its Jews, Netanyahu said his government is the first to invest in Jerusalem's eastern [Arab] neighborhoods.

"Go there and take a look," he told the journalists. "You'll see the new streets and sidewalks and all the other improvements."

Another of the plan's goals, he said, is to "develop and protect" the city's sites associated with Jewish history. Asked if its Christian and Muslim sites would be given similar treatment, he replied in the affirmative.

Open rift developing between Arafat, Husseini

By JAY BUSHINSKY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — An open rift between Palestinian Authority (PA) Chairman Yasser Arafat and his chief representative in Jerusalem, Faisal Husseini, stems from divergent views about the city's future status, and not only from a dispute over allegedly missing funds, sources said recently.

Arafat's proposal that Husseini become the PA's minister in charge of Wakfs was linked to the Palestinian leader's wish to replace him with "someone who will go along with the formula worked out by Mahmoud Abbas and MK Yossi Beilin (Labor) designating Jerusalem's outlying Abu Dis district as the PA's capital.

Husseini dismissed this account as totally inaccurate. "People are talking about something they know nothing about," he said.

Asked about the proposal that he be in charge of the Wakfs, he said, "I don't believe it is on the agenda."

The tension between Arafat and Husseini was said to have exploded at the last PA cabinet meeting. Husseini was quoted as having said, "If you ask me where are the $5 million that allegedly are missing, why don't you ask your aides where are the millions of dollars they have been stealing every day?"

At that point, Arafat reportedly ordered Husseini to leave, but Husseini refused saying, "This isn't your home. It's a Palestinian house."

Husseini said he would not comment on cabinet proceedings.

This confrontation evidently occurred in an atmosphere of intense internal rivalry and jockeying for position among PA figures.

They were said to have reached the point at which Arafat will be unable to carry out the ministerial shuffle he is believed to have in mind.

For example, a sharp warning was said to have come from Cairo that if Planning Minister Nabil Shaath is dismissed, Arafat no longer will be welcome in Egypt, a Palestinian political observer said.

Husseini rejected the idea of Abu Dis serving as the PA's capital, contending that this would undermine the very basis of the peace process.

"The whole process is built on UN Security Council Resolution 242, which means Israel's return to the 1967 borders," he said. "Any changes would mean opening the process from the beginning. Anyone in Israel who tells me he or she has rights in 'Judea and Samaria' would simply prompt me to say we lay claim to territory inside Israel."

Asked to comment about the fact that Jordan held part of Jerusalem from 1949 to 1967 and did not designate it as the Palestinian capital, Husseini said the city was held in custodial status pending a solution to the Palestinian problem.

In a parallel development, the PA's American and European benefactors were said to be demanding the dismissal of Mohammed Rashid from his senior economic post for "acting as if he were running a private business," a source said.

"The Europeans warned that if the PA did not clean up its house they won't give it any more money," a source said.

Technion satellite to blast off

By DAVID RUDGE
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — A second Technion satellite was set to blast off for space aboard a Russian Zenith rocket this week, three years after the first effort ended in failure.

Students, scientists and experts from hi-tech companies who have invested seven years of work on the $8-million project will be keeping their fingers crossed that the Gurwin II TechSat micro-satellite will not suffer the same fate as its predecessor.

The launch is to take place from the Baikonur Space Centre in Kazakhstan, and within a few hours it will be known whether it has been successful.

The first Gurwin TechSat was launched aboard a converted Russian SS-25 rocket that had formerly been used as an intercontinental ballistic missile from the cosmodrome at Plesetzk in the Arctic Circle, 900 kilometres north of Moscow.

On that occasion, the fifth stage of the rocket did not ignite, and the module with the Technion satellite inside did not reach its orbit and crashed back to Earth.

The second and improved version of the Technion satellite was to be launched "piggyback style" along with a large Russian one and four other smaller satellites: Australian, German-Belgian, British-Chilean and British-Thai.

The Zenith rocket used in the launch is considered to be far better suited for the job and has proven to be highly successful in previous missions of this nature.

The TechSat II, named after New York businessman Joseph Gurwin, whose contributions made the project possible, is the smallest of all the satellites that will be aboard the Zenith.

The cube-shaped satellite measures just 45 centimetres on each side and weighs only 48 kilograms, but packs a high-tech payload.

It is considered to be the most inexpensive model of its kind with the lowest power consumption for its size – 10 watts compared to an average lightbulb's 60 to 100 watts. The energy is provided by four solar panels on the sides of the cube, which will be used to power the various scientific experiments, including the satellite's specially developed electricity-saving mini computer.

The satellite, which has also been funded by the Science Ministry through the auspices of the Israel Space Agency, will provide communication services and be used for tests using X-ray detectors and a device for measuring ozone concentration in the Earth's atmosphere.

TechStat is scheduled to reach an orbit altitude of 830 km and will circle the Earth every 119 minutes. The data collected will be transmitted to the ground station at the Technion's Asher Space Research Institute, headed by Prof. Moshe Guelman.

Russia-Syria ties starting to improve

BY DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — The Moscow-Damascus axis is up and running again.

In a move that has the potential to alter the political landscape of the Middle East, Russia has returned to the region, where it is picking up the pieces that slipped from the grasp of the dissolving Soviet Union.

Ties with Damascus, formerly Moscow's closest ally in the region, will be reinforced in the autumn when Syrian President Hafez al-Assad, who rarely travels outside his country, makes his first visit to Russia since the 1991 collapse of the Soviet empire.

The announcement of Assad's trip was made at a news conference recently by the Russian ambassador to Damascus, Viktor Gogitidze, and coincides with media reports that the two countries have concluded their biggest arms deal in years.

It also comes against the backdrop of growing Syrian perceptions of American weakness in the region, exemplified by Washington's apparent failure to convert declarations of political determination into action – in the crisis earlier this year with Iraq, in getting Europe to agree to U.S. sanctions against Iran and in advancing the Middle East peace process.

During his news conference, Gogitidze said Russian-Syrian ties – which have been cool in recent years – had started to improve in all sectors, including cooperation in military and economic fields.

In a statement rife with significance to all Middle East watchers, the envoy said Russia was "keen to strengthen Syria's defensive military capabilities because this would help maintain stability in the Middle East."

The ambassador confirmed that Russian and Syrian forces had conducted joint military exercises in Russia last year and that many Russian military experts were working in Syria.

But he declined to confirm reports of new arms sales to Syria.

According to the Russian daily newspaper Segodnya, an arms plant in the Russian city of Tula has started supplying the Syrian army with more than 1,000 Cornet anti-tank guided missiles.

The sale of the mobile missiles, which have a range of about eight miles, would be the largest deal concluded between Russia and Syria since the collapse of the Soviet Union.

Segodnya also reported that Syria would soon receive long-range surface-to-air missiles from Russia.

The Israeli daily Ha'aretz, which also reported last week on the missile deal, cited Israeli security officials who said they were concerned by the latest developments and that the new anti-tank missiles were "a big step forward" for the Syrian army.

At the same time, however, the newspaper said the Israeli security establishment had not changed its basic opinion that while Syria is preparing a military option, it would probably not trigger a war with Israel in the near future.

The growing ties between Russia and Syria come amid a steadily growing rapprochement between Israel and Turkey – an alliance that has provoked angry outbursts from Iran and Syria, who are themselves close allies.

In recent months, Israel and Turkey have implemented major economic agreements and far-reaching military accords that permit each to use the other's air space and air bases.

Among other advantages, the agreements provide Israel with the ability to maintain surveillance of military movements in northern Syria and place its aircraft within potential striking distance of Iran's nascent nuclear facilities.

The Israeli-Turkish relationship is likely to come up during Assad's scheduled visit to Moscow as part of discussions regarding the balance of power in the region.

During the news conference, Gogitidze said several economic co-operation agreements, including deals on oil and gas, would be signed during Assad's visit, his first since April 1990.

Gogitidze said the current volume of trade between Syria and Russia – about $150 million (US) a year – falls far short of its potential.

He added that Assad would also discuss ideas for breaking the deadlock in the Syrian-Israeli peace talks, which were broken off in March 1996.

Canadian gets 'Amit Yerushalayim' award

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

JERUSALEM — An honorary award, Amit Yerushalayim (Guardian of Jerusalem) was recently presented to Dr. Elie Borowski, former Torontonian and founder of the Bible Lands Museum Jerusalem, by Jerusalem's Mayor Ehud Olmert.

The award is given by the Jerusalem City Council to an individual who has made a contribution to the quality of life of the citizens of Jerusalem.

Government ministers, Knesset members, Israeli and Arab students and supporters of the museum from Israel and abroad – Japan, Germany, Switzerland, Canada and the United States – attended the ceremony, held in the garden of the museum. It was followed by a reception and gala dinner in honor of Borowski's 85th birthday and the sixth anniversary of the opening of the Bible Lands Museum.

In a tribute to Borowski, Olmert said, "Your vision, which established the museum as an institute of learning for people of all faiths, has allowed thousands to experience our biblical history in a truly unique way."

She noted that the newly opened exhibition of 250 objects titled, Sacred Bounty-Sacred Land, The Seven Species of the Land of Israel, is in celebration of the 50th anniversary of the State of Israel.

The new exhibition, she said, will be incorporated into the museum's educational programming, whose aims are to bring young people closer to the values of the past.

In a tribute to Borowski, former Jerusalem Mayor Teddy Kollek, who played a role in the establishment of the museum said, "The wealth of beautiful and important objects that you collected over 50 years have now come to rest in Jerusalem.

"The many significant and impressive exhibitions that have been mounted at the Bible Lands Museum since its establishment, using your objects as the centrepoint of the shows, have greatly contributed to a better understanding of our past and a deeper appreciation of archeology in general."

Meir Rosenne, who chaired the tribute dinner, expressed his deep gratitude to Borowski "for having enriched the legacy of the Jewish people. When the history of this era will be written, the historians will record your love, devotion and dedication to art, to history, to education and above all, your unparalleled determination to make sure that Jews, young and old, know more about their history."

Labor's Barak hasn't lived up to expectations

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

A year ago this month, Israel's most decorated soldier, Ehud Barak, won the Labor party's leadership. But as a politician, he has proven to be less adept than as an army commander.

Shortly after stepping down as chief of staff, Barak was brought into government by Yitzhak Rabin as minister of interior. With Rabin's assassination, Barak served as foreign minister under Shimon Peres. When Peres resigned after the Likud's razor-thin victory in the 1996 election, Barak ran for the chairmanship of the Labor party.

Viewed as Rabin's natural successor because of his rigorous security credentials, Barak was widely portrayed as a leader who could unseat the bumbling prime minister, Benjamin Netanyahu, in the next election.

But as so often happens in politics, Barak has not lived up to expectations. Having first raced ahead of Netanyahu in public opinion polls, he has fallen behind him of late, triggering spasms of doubt regarding his ability to lead the party to victory.

In an attempt to broaden his appeal, he has reached out to right-of-centre voters who normally might not vote for Labor. As a result, he has been accused of fudging the issues by none other than Peres, who claims that the party "does not speak with a clear voice" anymore.

Peres, having been rejected as party president by Barak, certainly has an axe to grind. But to a degree, his accusation rings true.

Barak, who claims that Netanyahu is strangling the Oslo peace process and thereby endangering Israel, wants to achieve what he grandly describes as a "historic compromise" with the Arabs.

Believing that peace with the Palestinians can be reached through formal separation ("High fences make good neighbors," he has said.), Barak recognizes their right to statehood with "somewhat limited" powers. But Barak has not come out clearly for a Palestinian state, and has gone on record as favoring a confederation between the Jordanians and the Palestinians.

When he was recently asked to comment on an American proposal for a 13 percent Israeli redeployment from the West Bank in exchange for sweeping Palestinian concessions, he declined to answer, saying lamely: "It wouldn't be right for me to interfere with [Netanyahu] in his negotiations."

Barak's demurral was odd, given his position that Israel is obliged to relinquish further swaths of territory to the Palestinian Authority.

Even stranger, Barak declared, "We will remain in Beit El forever." To Rabin, Beit El – established by the Likud in a densely populated Palestinian area – was considered a "political" rather than a "security" settlement and thus expendable. But to Barak, who abstained on the 1995 Oslo 2 agreement, Beit El is an unquestioned asset to be defended at all costs.

Like Rabin, Peres and Netanyahu, Barak is of the opinion that Israel cannot return to its pre-1967 borders and must retain a military presence along the Jordan River. With respect to the Golan Heights, he diverges from the Likud, saying that the depth of an Israeli withdrawal will be determined by the quality of a peace accord signed by Israel and Syria.

Barak, however, is absolutely clear on Jerusalem. The city should remain Israel's undivided capital, with Palestinians enjoying autonomous rights in their neighborhoods. He recognizes Har Choma as Israeli territory, but thinks that its development should be deferred until the completion of final status talks, which are two years behind schedule at this juncture.

Barak has also been unambiguous on two other key issues.

He opposes the divisive conversion bill, saying it should not be passed until the needs of the Reform and Conservative movements are met. And in conformity with his belief that haredi men are shirking their national obligations, he has presented a bill requiring virtually all of them to serve in the armed forces.

Since Haredim are anti-Labor anyway, Barak had nothing to lose by championing this legislation.

Milo, Shahak may join forces

By MICHAL YUDELMAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

TEL AVIV — Mayor Ronni Milo said last week that if he is elected prime minister, he would appoint outgoing Chief of Staff Lt.-Gen. Amnon Shahak as defence minister, providing the latter joins his list.

Sources from both Likud and Labor said that on his release from the IDF next month, Shahak will receive two offers – from Labor leader Ehud Barak and from Milo – to be their Number 2 and candidate for defence minister.

Milo, who was interviewed on Channel 2's Meet the Press, said that Likud MK Dan Meridor would join his list and several senior Labor and Likud MKs have already agreed to join his list.

"I believe Meridor will be on my list," Milo said. "He hasn't yet made the move, but he has announced in public that he has no confidence in Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. We've sat and talked about our plans, and we agreed it was pointless to form yet another centrist party."

Milo stressed he was "not obsessive about being Number 1. If Meridor or Shahak will have better chances of winning, they can take the lead."

Asked if he has already spoken to Shahak about this, Milo said, "He's still in uniform, and I won't involve him in political business as long as he is. But I want people like him. I hope very much he will join me and be my defence minister."

Milo expressed confidence in getting enough votes to reach the second round in elections for prime minister.

New Child Support Guidelines still leave room for interpretation

In recent issues I explained that child support in Canada is now governed by Guidelines. These Guidelines are comprised of presumptive tables or a grid, wherein the precise amount of support is determined by the payer's gross income and the number of children.

According to the Ontario Court of Appeal, Judges may award different amounts in only a very few specific situations, such as when custody is shared or when the children are "split" (one child residing with one parent, the other child(ren) residing with the other parent). The payer could also be obliged to contribute to "add-ons" — such as the cost of day care — in proportion to the income of the recipient (i.e. his ex-spouse).

A Court may also oblige the payer to contribute to "extraordinary expenses" for extracurricular activities. While Judges have virtually no discretion to change the basic table amounts, it is within their power to direct the payer to contribute to these particular expenses. On the other hand, they can decline to do so if they feel that the expense in question is unreasonable.

The Court must consider whether the expense is in the child's "best interests" and within the means of the parents. The Court can also review the spending habits of the family prior to the parents' separation. Finally, child support is no longer tax deductible for agreements or Court orders signed after May 1, 1997. However, the amounts ordered or agreed upon prior to that date are often much higher than those occurring after May 1, 1977 because the old support amounts often incorporated a component for tax liability. Amounts payable under earlier agreements or Court orders are still tax deductible. One can usually have old orders or agreements changed by the Court or by agreement so that child support is governed by the new Guidelines. However, before deciding to do so, parents should consult a tax expert, such as an accountant, to ensure that the change benefits them.

One of the purposes of the new system was to make the calculation of child support much easier for lawyers (when negotiating) and Judges. The idea was simple: the presumptive tables would end many costly lawsuits involving endless debate on how the amount of child support should be calculated. The Guidelines have now been in force for over one year.

I write a newsletter for Quicklaw (a national computerized legal research service) called the Syrtash Family Law Newsletter. During the past year I have reviewed hundreds of cases and have frequently negotiated and/or litigated child support within my professional practise. I must sadly report that despite the best intentions of the legislators, the objective of simplifying child support has been only partially successful.

There is no question that determining the basic amount payable (the presumptive table amount) has made one part of the exercise very simple. In many (if not most) cases, it resolves the issue of child support entirely, particularly in parts of Canada where local incomes do not permit many expensive extracurricular activities.

However, Judges across Canada cannot seem to agree on when expenses for such activities are "extraordinary". Two recent appellate decisions, one in Nova Scotia (Raftus vs. Raftus) and the other in Manitoba (Andries vs. Andries), appear to suggest that only in rare circumstances will payers be obliged to contribute to such expenses. The expenditure must be unusually high. For instance, the costs associated with buying ice hockey equipment, team fees or normal travel expenses have to be paid entirely by the custodial parent, without financial assistance from the supporting spouse beyond the basic presumptive amount. However, if the child is required to take extraordinarily costly trips as a team member, then the Court may order a contribution towards these "extraordinary" costs because they are ancillary to the normal expenses of such activities.

Many lower Courts across Canada, particularly in Ontario, have ruled contrary to this approach. These Courts have ordered that the supporting spouse share in the direct (as well as indirect) costs of hockey, ballet, swimming, summer camps and other activities in addition to paying the basic presumptive amounts.

Only a Supreme Court of Canada ruling or an amendment to the Guidelines will clarify the incredible lack of consistency on this critical issue for estranged parents and the lawyers advising them. At the moment, the lawyer must know which Judge will be making the decision, which in itself is difficult and often impossible. Meanwhile, in light of the confusion in the Courts, I cannot conclude that the Guidelines have solved the need for simplicity.

In a future issue, I will discuss further problems with the Guidelines, particularly insofar as they relate to spousal support.

'Jew Hill' cemetery in disrepair

Today the cemetery is in an advanced state of disrepair. From a nearby road, the cemetery appears to be a small, unkempt wooded area. Lying adjacent to Beth Chaim Cemetery are the well-kept Roman Catholic, Anglican and Masons' graveyards. Kushner said that visitors who stand at the edge of the lot can see the remains of an arched gateway, with Beth Chaim painted in Hebrew and a picket fence. There are seven graves in the cemetery, he added, of which only one, that of Solomon (Samuel) Packer, of Odessa, Russia, is clearly visible.

The society hopes to raise $40,000 to finance the cemetery project. "Marilyn Berger, of Canadian Jewish Congress, Pacific region, has been helpful," Kushner said. "The society is optimistic that Congress will help fund the project."

Plans call for clearing the overgrowth in the cemetery; repairing the original picket fence; making a path from the road to the cemetery site; researching the people who are buried in the cemetery and erecting proper markers over each grave; and, finally, rededicating the cemetery on Aug. 22.

The society also hopes to find out what happened to the Jews who aren't buried in the Dawson City cemetery, who moved on as the gold rush wound down.

"The society already knows, for example, that Louis Brier moved to Vancouver and left a legacy which became the foundation of the Louis Brier Home for the Aged and Extended Care Hospital," Kushner said.

When Kushner is not involved in the cemetery project, he is director, Legal Services of the Yukon territorial government. He and his wife, Susan Maccara, a native of the Yukon, and their son, Lars, moved to Whitehorse from Edmonton almost two years ago.

Whitehorse is a small city of 22,000 to 23,000, of whom only 15 to 20 are Jewish. Kushner said most Jews in Whitehorse know, or are at least acquainted with, each other.

Kushner said he hopes Jews from other parts of Canada will come to the Yukon for the August rededication ceremony.

"It's a piece of Canadian Jewish history that few people are aware of," Kushner said.

From Russia With Love:

Choreographer Kim Frank wins praise in Moscow

By DOROTHY LICHTBLAU
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — For several months, Montreal-born, Toronto-based choreographer Kim Frank had an impact on Russian theatre.

Her latest work, In Search of the Miraculous, which premiered in Moscow's Stanislavsky Theatre in December 1997, won critical praise for its innovative style. Dedicated to the life of Russian mystic philosopher George Gurdjieff, the work is a synthesis of dance, opera and theatre, which Frank co-created with theatre director Vladimir Mirzoyev.

The two met eight years ago during the run of The Inspector General, a production of the Russian director's company, Horizontal Eight.

Frank say she was drawn to Mirzoyev's work immediately. "I loved this work. I recognized this work. It's really close to the work I do, except that he's coming from a theatre background and I'm coming from a dance background."

Shortly after their first encounter, Frank became the Horizontal Eight's choreographer and remained with the company until 1996.

In Search of the Miraculous is the third production Frank has been associated with in Russia. With each new piece, she has not only further developed her own work, but has also had an influence on the direction of dance in Russia, where classically trained artists have had little opportunity to learn the language of contemporary movement.

Now back in Canada, Frank prepared the Canadian Dance Festival, held in Ottawa on June 10. Canadian audiences were able to see Wood, Frank's revised version of the Gurdjieff piece. She will present a new work created with the dancers of La Groupe Dance Lab this fall, at Danceworks 98 in Toronto.

Frank began training at the age of five with her mother Angie Frank, a Montreal dance teacher, and during her childhood, she was exposed to a variety of dance classes. Whenever her mother travelled to New York to participate in classes at the Alvin Ailey School or the Maggie Black Studio, Kim Frank accompanied her and observed classes.

In 1980, Frank, then 18, decided to commit to becoming a professional dancer. After a couple of years in the Fine Arts program at York University, she was invited to join the Peggy McCann and Dancers company. She taught dance at McGill University in 1984 and studied theatre with Anne Page, who influenced her move into choreography.

Frank first created works inspired by text, such as With Blue, a piece that integrated Sylvia Plath's poetry. Later she turned away from a cerebral approach to one inspired by physical action.

In the late 1980s, she found a home with Toronto Independent Dance Enterprise as a choreographer and dancer. After the company dissolved, she collaborated with various artists, and since 1989, she has choreographed 18 works.

Willy, dedicated to Frank's father and based on Arthur Miller's Death of a Salesman, began as a solo piece and evolved to a quintet for five male dancers. The Bride, Dig and Doyne Suite represent Frank's exploration of and response to her Jewish heritage. As Frank's work developed, critics began to recognize her for her dramatic style and tight technical control.

Since 1990, as choreographer for Horizontal Eight, Frank has focused on dance for theatre. When the door to work in Moscow opened, Frank walked through. She encountered an exciting, fast-changing society that endures hardship, yet supports the arts, and she discovered a magnificent, historically rich city.

Have a dialogue with public

She also was astounded at the degree of hospitality extended to her. Though living in a tiny one-bedroom apartment, Mirzoyev, his wife, his two daughters and his mother warmly opened their home to Frank during her entire first visit to Moscow.

Frank says the most significant thing she gained in Russia was the experience of working in a country where art and artists are valued.

"My experience in Moscow really showed me how important it is for artists to have a dialogue with their public, to work in a place where there is a tradition of going to the theatre."

Since the arts are subsidized by the government, they are accessible to a great many people, Frank says. An educated Russian is informed about cultural history and keeps up with contemporary work. It is not unusual for whole families to regularly attend the theatre together.

"As a Canadian artist, it is easy to feel marginalized and to feel that what you do doesn't matter. You know the same 100 people will come out and see your shows all the time and critics don't really pay attention. In Moscow, you can receive 17 or 18 reviews…people are interested in the arts."

After her Canadian projects are completed, Frank plans to return to Moscow to work on a new piece and to train dancers. Ideally she would like to divide her time between Canada and Russia.

Jewish quarter of Krakow experiencing revitalization

By JOSEPH SERGE
Travel Editor

KRAKOW — It is ironic that poetic licence has served to revitalize one of Poland's oldest Jewish quarters.

Director Stephen Spielberg decided to shoot most of Schindler's List in Krakow's Jewish quarter – or Kazimierz as it is formally known – even though the central action of the film is set in Plaszow, across the river from Krakow.

Yet Kazimierz has benefitted greatly from this. Once a centre of Jewish culture in Poland, the Jewish quarter was largely forgotten and neglected after the war during Communist rule. Now with the interest sparked by Spielberg's film, many Jewish tourists are flocking to this 300 metre by 300 metre area of Krakow.

There are even "Schindler" tours organized in the United States and Poland. The fact that Krakow is only about 600 kilometres east of Auschwitz also makes it an obvious stop for anyone touring "Jewish Poland."

Of about 70,000 Jews in Krakow in 1939, there's now only a handful left – anywhere from 100 to 500 depending on whom you ask– but the increase in tourism to the area has brought with it money and a restoration of Krakow's Jewish quarter.

Krakow is fortunate in that it avoided being destroyed in World War II. Although the German occupiers are alleged to have mined the city prior to their retreat, none of the bombs were set off by the time the Red Army "liberated" the city. Therefore many of Krakow's old buildings are still intact.

The first thing you'll see upon walking southeast into the Jewish quarter along Jozifa Street is the splendid Stara (old) Synagogue. This synagogue, now the Museum of History and Culture of Krakow Jewry, is the oldest shul in Poland, dating back to the 15th century. Inside this brightly lit museum are many liturgical objects and an exhibit of photographs depicting Jewish life in Nazi-occupied Krakow.

Reconstructed after a 1557 fire in Renaissance style by the Italian architect Matteo Gucci, this impressive building has a reconstructed bimah and the original Aron Kodesh in the eastern wall. The museum is open Wednesday to Sunday.

The main street of the Jewish quarter is Szeroka Street. This small and crowded street houses the Remu'h Synagogue, one of two functioning synagogues in Krakow. (The other one is the Tempel Synagogue.) This Orthodox synagogue dates back to the mid-16th century and is open to visitors Monday to Friday. There were many other synagogues in pre-war Krakow but these are now either padlocked or turned into secular buildings.

The Remu'h cemetery, located just behind the synagogue, is one of two Jewish cemeteries in Krakow. During the occupation, the Nazis razed all the tombstones of this historic burial place. After the war, workers reconstructing the cemetery found many previously buried tombstones dating back to the 16th century. These tombstones have been restored, and the cemetery is now recognized as one of the best preserved Jewish Renaissance cemeteries in Europe. There are about 5,000 tombstones made of marble, limestone and sandstone.

The New Jewish cemetery was established in 1800 and is the only still-functioning Jewish cemetery in Krakow.

If you're looking for a quick bite to eat or something to drink, there are a few cafes in the Jewish quarter. The most famous one is the Ariel Cafe on Szeroka Street not far from the Jordan, a Jewish bookstore that also offers guided tours of Kazimierz.

The Ariel is so famous there are two of them – side by side. I heard conflicting stories as to why there are two, but the most believable one is that the young Polish couple who ran the original Ariel had a falling out and decided to go separate ways, each laying claim to the name Ariel.

In the spring and summer you can sit on the patio outside either of these cafes and enjoy the sounds of live klezmer music coming from inside.

There is a Centre for Jewish Culture in Kazimierz, a very pretty building in the centre of things. Strangely enough it isn't run by Jews, but it does organize an annual Jewish Cultural Festival that brings in many Jewish films and musicians to Krakow.

Getting to Krakow by LOT, the Polish airline, used to require a brief stopover in Warsaw. But starting last May, LOT introduced the first of nine direct Toronto-Krakow flights for 1998. The airline plans to increase this frequency next year. Keep in mind Canadian citizens are required to obtain a visa from the nearest Polish Consulate.

Montreal-born artist employs mixed media

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The sun streams over an abstract triptych, Memory, which illustrates Sylvia Singer's frequent absorption with views through windows.

Singer says the centre panel, reminiscent of an apple orchard, was inspired "by a neighbor's wonderful tree in blossom," visible from a window in her Niagara-on-the-Lake house. The warmth of awakening spring contrasts with the cool blues and greens of the side panels, reaching back to early memory.

Montreal-born Singer, now based in Toronto with her husband, a University of Toronto professor, notes that her interest in window scenes dates back to childhood when she was not well and spent many hours looking longingly from her bedroom window.

The indoor restriction honed a sensitivity to nature evident in all her works.

Deep Summer, with its yellows and lively greens mingled with browns, focuses clearly on the outdoors. Rosemary's Garden, The Original, taken from an onsite sketch, is all lush flowers and foliage. Both "feel good" paintings are done in oil stick on paper, a medium which utilizes crayon shaped bars of solid oil paints.

Ominous nature is defined by Moon Over the Bay, recalling a stormy night in Newfoundland.

Singer, who holds a fine arts degree from McGill University, also studied printmaking and ceramics. She has become very much a mixed media person, experimenting with a variety of art materials and exploring innovative techniques. She is excited about a new process called repography, which involves layering images on silk over photographs, increasing depth perception and luminance.

A recent solo exhibition at the Illuminary Art Gallery featured some of these pieces. A few are currently on display. She has just completed a commission, Antique Roses, which reveals repography's enchantment.

Singer also exhibited at the Galerie Rochon, Aggregation Gallery and the Art Gallery of Ontario. Her works hang in private and corporate collections and she is also represented at the National Gallery in Ottawa, the Art Gallery of Hamilton, the Canadian Exhibition Commission and the Confederation Art Gallery and Museum on Prince Edward Island. As well, some paintings are presently on view at the Ontario Ombudsman's office across from the Royal Ontario Museum.

In addition to her personal work and studies, Singer has practised art psychotherapy with adults and children.

She has had the good fortune to accompany her husband on sabbaticals to countries as far apart as Australia and Israel, expanding her vision. She looks forward to recapturing her Israeli experience in a series using her new body of material.

A masterful examination of Jewish 'new Muslims'

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to the CJN

In 1839 an unfounded rumor spread among the Shi'ite Muslims of the town of Meshhed in north-eastern Iran that a Jewish woman had committed an act of disrespect towards Islam.

According to a contemporaneous account preserved in the Central Zionist Archives in Jerusalem, an angry mob "attacked the Jewish quarter, broke into the Jewish houses, and robbed and looted everything they could lay their hands on. They beat the Jews cruelly, killed 36 Jewish men, and abducted many beautiful Jewish maidens taking them into the houses of Muslims."

Following this traumatic pogrom, the roughly 400 Jewish families in Meshhed were forced to convert to Islam, a process known as the Allahdad – a word that means "God's gift" in Arabic but which the Jews interpreted as "God's punishment." Thereafter, they were known as the Jadid al-Islam or "new Muslims."

Outwardly, the Jews of Meshhed practised Islam – they prayed in mosques, performed wedding ceremonies and buried their dead in accordance with Muslim rituals, even made the required pilgrimages to Mecca and Medina.

Inwardly, however, they remained Jewish. As Raphael Patai writes in his very well-researched book, Jadid Al-Islam: The Jewish "New Muslims" of Meshhed (Wayne State University, 1997) nothing could have prevented them "from reciting the Jewish prayers in the privacy of their homes and maintaining the consciousness of being Jews and not Muslims."

The Jadidim kept a separate cemetery, fasted in secret on Yom Kippur, and kept up many Jewish rituals away from the prying eyes of their Shi'ite neighbors. These crypto-Jews of Meshhed thus maintained a complex dual life filled with a parallel assortment of difficulties and perils that the Conversos must have faced in Inquisitionera Spain.

Patai began his research in the 1940s by conducting long interviews with knowledgeable Meshhed Jadidim who had arrived in Jerusalem. He wrote some articles at the time, then let his knowledge grow and mature for half a century.

Through a masterful and logical examination of many sources, he traces the history of Jewish life in Meshhed before, during and after the Allahdad, and offers chapters on the "decade of blood libels" that began in 1892, the lure of early Zionism and aliyah, and many local folk-tales and legends. One section is devoted to birth customs, Jewish names and origins, Hebrew education, marriage and burial customs and like subjects. The book also contains a glossary of Judeo-Persian vocabulary.

Reflecting a deep understanding of the Muslim and Jewish cultures as well as the high level of scholarship for which Patai is renowned, this fascinating account of a little-known branch of the Jewish family tree is must reading for anyone with an interest in Persian Jews, or the subjects of Jewish culture, history and anthropology in general.

Patai died in 1996 at the age of 85, leaving this significant work to be published posthumously.

Eye on Arts

ROBERT SILVERMAN TO PLAY BEETHOVEN

Pianist Robert Silverman is set to perform Ludwig van Beethoven's complete cycle of 32 piano sonatas, which have been collectively described as "music's steepest pinnacle," in a series of eight concerts over two summers in Toronto.

"Beethoven's music speaks immutable universals about the human spirit," says the accomplished Canadian pianist, who has performed with many orchestras internationally. "Their immense range and richness of expression make the music sound as fresh and revolutionary today as it did the moment the ink on Beethoven's manuscript was dry."

The series begins July 7 and 8, continues on July 15 and 16, and is scheduled for completion with four concerts during the summer of 1999.

During the July 9 concert, Silverman will be presented with The Paul de Hueck and Norman Walford Career Achievement Award for Keyboard Artistry, a $10,000 award administered by the Ontario Arts Council.

Adults, $18 per concert; subscription seats for the 1998 series are $50.

Book News: Toronto-born David Rotenberg, an acclaimed theatrical director and head of the graduate program in theatre at York University, has written The Shanghai Murders, A Mystery of Love and Ivory.

A detective novel, The Shanghai Murders explores the dark side of China's economic transformation as Inspector Zhong Fong investigates a series of "Dim Sum" killings in modern Shanghai. The book is published by St. Martin's Press of New York and distributed in Canada by McClelland & Stewart.

Rotenburg reads the opening chapter at a book launch July 16, 6:30 p.m. at the Sleuth of Baker Street, 1600 Bayview Ave., Toronto.

Workshop Performance: Father & Daughter, a new one-person play by Marlene Charney, is scheduled for workshop performances this week at the Three Sisters Festival Cafe. Focusing on the relationship between a Holocaust survivor and his daughter, the play examines both the harm and the good that parents transmit to their children, usually with the best of intentions. The work "promises to be compelling, controversial and, at times, comical."

Also being presented in a workshop is By The Water With Leslie, by Kristen Schiener, a play in memory of her friend Leslie Mahaffy. Three Sisters Festival Cafe is located at The Theatre Centre, 1032 Queen St. W. June 25, 26 and 27, 8 p.m., admission $5. June 28, 2:30 p.m., PWYC. 516-4740.

Dylan Doc Returns: Don't Look Back, the classic documentary by D.A. Pennebaker, presents an intimate portrait of Bob Dylan shot during the folk rocker's tour of England in the spring of 1965. By then the 23-year-old artist was already an international celebrity with several albums to his credit, and on the verge of making the controversial change from a solo acoustical musical style to an electric rock 'n' roll sound.

Folksinger Joan Baez and manager Albert Grossman were among Dylan's entourage, as were an array of journalists intent on getting the angry young man to explain himself. When Dylan takes on Time magazine the results are supposedly hilarious. He performs early trademark hits such as All I Really Want to Do, Maggie's Farm and Don't Think Twice, It's All Right.

Arts in Brief:

• The Avenue Road Arts Schools presents A Journey Through Time, an exhibition celebrating the art of children. June 25 to 28, 1 to 5 p.m. 460 Avenue Rd. 961-1502.

• The world premiere of Taking Sides, a play by writer/performer John Graham Davies, presents true stories from the Bosnian war as part of the Fringe Festival. Poor Alex Theatre, 292 Brunswick Ave., Toronto. July 4 to 11 (call for times). $8. 555-4653.

Bodybuilders pump themselves up naturally

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Mark Landecker's got some news for you. You know those pictures of bodybuilders strutting their stuff on stage, posing in skimpy bikinis with their muscles bulging and bodies glistening with oil?

Well, two weeks after the fact, those same athletes look nothing at all like that.

In fact, that hard-body look is cultivated specifically for competition, sort of like a champion athlete peaking for the playoffs.

Landecker, a competitive bodybuilder himself, speaks with first-hand experience. Last weekend, he participated in the 1st Annual Canadian National Natural Bodybuilding and Fitness Championships, held in Toronto. He finished seventh in his height category.

At five-foot-nine, 155 lbs., Landecker is not much heavier than the average guy who keeps himself in good shape. That's one of the byproducts of keeping your training regimen "natural," he said.

Unlike other competitive bodybuilders, Landecker, 22, refuses to take performance-enhancing drugs of any kind. Instead, he develops his sculpted physique through grueling workouts five days a week and by consuming a high protein, low fat diet. In the weeks leading up to a big event like last weekend's competition, Landecker and other bodybuilders also cut down on their fluid consumption.

That lets their veins bulge out more than usual and adds definition to an already highly sculpted, ultra-lean muscle mass, he said.

Jeffrey Kippel

Two weeks later, athletes return to their normal, though still highly musculatured, look, he added.

Bodybuilders who use steroids develop a very unnatural appearance that he, for one, does not find appealing. "The body's not meant to look that way. I can walk around in a T-shirt and no-one would know I'm a bodybuilder," he said.

For 28-year-old Jeffrey Kippel, "natural" is the way to go. As president of the International Natural Bodybuilders Association (INBA)-Canada, the organization that sponsored the weekend event, he's trying to promote the sport north of the border and give "natural" bodybuilders a forum for competition.

When it comes to open competitions, people who bodybuild but don't take performance-enhancing drugs are at a distinct disadvantage to those who do. "Either they give up on competition or they go to the United States," he said.

At the INBA event, participants went through various routines in which they demonstrated their flexibility, strength and symmetry. They also gave a 30-second description of the significance of bodybuilding to them.

A weightlifter back in high school, Kippel took to the sport more seriously about two years ago when he went through a divorce and a career change.

"I got into bodybuilding as a focus and to get through the life changes," he said. He immediately developed an appreciation for the sport and saw his weight drop from 200 lbs with a 42-inch waist on a five-foot-seven frame to 146 lbs and a 28-inch waist.

Last December, he met with INBA executives in Las Vegas to try and convince them to put him in charge of their Canadian division. He got their approval and began to promote the sport locally.

"There are quite a few people who are natural, but they're frustrated when they have to compete," he said.

Athletes who join the association agree to periodic tests to determine if they've taken performance-enhancing drugs. That keeps the sport clean and allows everyone to perform on a level playing field, Kippel said.

Proper nutrition is stressed in natural bodybuilding, Kippel and Landecker agree. During the last few days before he competes, Landecker consumes protein every two hours or so, making for six to seven meals a day. He'll eat fish three or four times and enjoy an omelet made with 12 eggs whites, with some potatoes on the side. In the morning, he'll have a protein shake along with some shredded wheat.

Whether he's at home preparing for a competition or shaking off fatigue to head to the gym for a workout, "discipline is basically what it comes down to," Landecker said.

He first got interested in the sport when he was about 17, seeing it then as a novelty. Prior to that, he and some buddies were pumping iron on a casual basis and he found his time at the gym a total escape from a hectic life. "It allows you to free your mind," he said.

He also enjoyed the recognition he received for his accomplishments. "It brings out the competitive spirit that's in everybody...I look at bodybuilding like an artist using his body as a canvas," he said.

Last year, Landecker combined his workouts with a heavy academic program at York University, where he studied for a degree in business administration. A former volunteer soccer coach at Beth Tikvah, Landecker is hoping to travel to Greece to compete in the Natural Universe competition.

Kippel, who runs his own personal training business, has ambitious plans for natural bodybuilding. He's planning to stage an event in Israel within the next 18 months and he's hoping to convince the Maccabi Canada to push for bodybuilding as a recognized sport at the Maccabiah Games.

Choirs take part in Zimriya

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The sanctuary of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue recently resonated with the sound of Jewish choral music as seven choirs performed works in Hebrew and Yiddish in celebration of Israel at 50.

The sanctuary, festooned with blue and white balloons and crepe paper in honor of Israel, was the venue of the recent Zimriya 1998, a festival of Jewish music featuring Jewish choirs from across the Greater Toronto Area.

An annual event since its inception in 1981, Zimriya has been sponsored by Jewish Music Toronto for the last four years. This year's event drew more than 600 people.

Participating in a choir requires a lot of dedication, Jewish Music Toronto vice-president and choral music chair Charles Heller told the audience. "It's a big commitment."

He explained that Zimriya 1998 was the fourth part of a four year series, which entailed the performance of songs grouped around specific themes: 1995 was peace; 1996 was Jerusalem 3000; and 1997 was creativity in the Diaspora.

Heller conducted the Zimriya Chorus this year, which is an amalgamation of members of the different choirs who meet specifically to perform final works of the Zimriya.

Participating choirs included Beth Tikvah Synagogue Choir, conducted by Srul Irving Glick; Temple Sinai Choir, conducted by Leslie Schwartz; Zemer Chorale of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, conducted by Charles Heller; Toronto Jewish Folk Choir, conducted by Esther Ghan Firestone; The Holy Blossom Temple Singers and Lachan: Toronto Jewish Chamber Choir, both conducted by Benjamin Maissner.

The accompanists were Ruthellen Shapero, Natasha Tyomkina, Lena Zemelman and Nadya Adler.

One of the highlights of this year's concert was Holy Blossom Temple Singer's performance of Zer Shirim, a new medley of songs commissioned in honor of Israel at 50. The work, created by Toronto-based Russian Jewish composer, Yefim Adler, reflected the history of the State of Israel.

A grant from UJA Federation Action Committee on Continuity funded this commissioned work, which premiered at the Zimriya. It will be performed by Lachan at the Hebrew Beach Institute June 14 and at the Studio Theatre of the Ford Centre of the Performing Arts on June 18.

Zimriya program chair was Srul Glick. Jerry Nesker is the president and patron chair of Jewish Music Toronto. Jewish Music Toronto operates under the auspices of the Koffler Centre of the Arts, the Bathurst Jewish Centre and the United Jewish Welfare Fund.

About Life

Dear Ella,

I had the scare of my life last week when a police officer called my home to tell me my father had been in a car accident. He quickly told me that my father was all right, just a bit shaken up, and it would be a good idea if I could get over there.

As I rushed to the scene, I envisioned seeing my father bloody, on a gurney and incoherent. When I got there he was fine. He was in a little strip plaza on Bathurst Street where he had backed into another car. I've been concerned about him driving for awhile now, as I have noticed how careless his driving sometimes is. When I bring up the subject, he just "poo poos" it away. I don't want to ruin his golden years by insisting he not drive; however, I am afraid for him and the drivers around him on the road. Any suggestions?

Desperate to Drive

Dear Desperate to Drive,

I myself have been in many of those strip plazas along Bathurst and I've sometimes wondered if Mario Andretti could negotiate his way through them.

You have to think long and hard before you make an attempt to stop your father from driving. Remember, driving means independence. It is the ability to come and go as one pleases on a whim without asking or relying on anyone. Without independence, you can open up a whole can of worms. On the other hand, you can't have him on the road if he is dangerous to himself and others.

Discuss a driver's refresher course with your father. They do exist for older people and may improve his driving by bringing back some proper habits he may not have anymore.

Compromise by asking him not to drive at dusk and at night. Remind him not to drive when he is tired or when the weather is bad. Make sure he wears his seat belt at all times and that any medication he is taking does not dull his senses and reaction time. If he wear glasses for distance, make sure he uses them and that they are clean. An eyesight and hearing test wouldn't hurt either.

In short, do what you can to set your mind at ease and to keep him as safe as possible on the road. Remember accidents don't just happen to seniors.

Nazis looted billions

By MARILYN HENRY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

NEW YORK — The Nazis looted between $9 billion (US) and $14 billion in Jewish assets in the 20 countries they occupied during World War II, Reuters reported, citing a study by the World Jewish Congress (WJC) to be released shortly.

The report, prepared by economist Sidney Jay Zabludoff, said the assets would be worth between $90 billion and $140 billion at today's prices.

Personal monetary holdings and investments accounted for about 40 to 50 percent of each country's Jewish assets. Residential real estate accounted for about 25 percent and business assets about 15 percent, according to Reuters.

In testimony in May before the New York state Senate Insurance Committee, the WJC estimated that Jewish losses ranged from $23 billion to $32 billion in 1945 dollars, according to AP.

WJC estimates

Its report, based on an analysis of pre-war per capita estimates of Jewish wealth, was scheduled to be released in connection with a State Department conference this week.

Representatives from dozens of nations and non-governmental organizations, including Jewish groups, were to meet in Washington this week to hammer out an agenda for an international conference on Nazi loot.

The American conference, scheduled for late November, is expected to focus on art, insurance and other plundered assets.

It is the successor to a conference last December in London that was devoted to Nazi gold. At that time, Britain and the United States called for the establishment of an international fund to help victims of Nazi persecution, and suggested that nations donate the remaining gold – only now being returned – that Nazis had looted from the central banks of Europe.

France pledged last week to contribute around 20 million francs ($3.3 million) to the fund, and Norway's cabinet approved a draft law to pay 450 million crowns ($58 million) to Jewish survivors, their descendants and Jewish organizations.

The CJN wins awards

More garlands for The CJN.

For the second year in a row, the paper has been named best overall specialty publication of 1997 by the Quebec Community Newspapers Association (QCNA).

As well, The CJN has won another Simon Rockower Award, the highest honor bestowed by the American Jewish Press Association.

Third consecutive year

The paper won a Rockower for Excellence in Special Sections or Supplements for its pull-out supplement in September on Zionism After 100 Years.

The Rockower awards were presented in Cleveland last week.

It was the third consecutive year The CJN has received Rockower recognition.

"We're very proud of the collective efforts of the entire CJN staff," said The CJN editor Mordechai Ben-Dat.

In conferring the QCNA award, the jury commented The CJN was well written, with "great content, lots of photos, clear and concise, interesting columns, lots of nicely produced ads, good advertising content. Overall a great paper."

The jury consisted of editors and journalists from community newspapers in the Atlantic provinces, under a reciprocal arrangement that saw the QCNA send judges to that region last year.

These were the 10th annual awards presented by the QCNA, which has 33 member English-language and bilingual weekly and biweekly newspapers in the province.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Romanian Jewish Concerns

OTTAWA — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) recently joined a delegation from the Association of Romanian Jewish Survivors of the Holocaust at a meeting here with officials from Foreign Affairs Canada.

The groups repeated priorities presented in a brief last month to Romanian President Emil Constantinescu in Montreal.

They included better education about the Holocaust, restitution for seized property and possessions, and an end to memorializing war-era Iron Guard collaborators.

Ronen Honored

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) national president Moshe Ronen has been elected to the board of governors of North York General Hospital.

In recognition of his volunteer service to the general community, Isabel Bassett, Ontario's minister of Citizenship, Culture and Recreation, presented Ronen the Volunteer Service Award at a ceremony at Roy Thompson Hall last week.

ISRAEL

Viagra Ban Dropped

JERUSALEM — Israel has dropped its ban on the sexual impotency pill Viagra.

The Health Ministry announced it was again permitting doctors to prescribe the drug after it received clarifications from its manufacturer on the deaths of at least six Americans who had taken it.

Rabin's Assassin Appeals

JERUSALEM — Israel heard an appeal last week from Yigal Amir, Yitzhak Rabin's assassin, who is serving a life sentence. Amir, his brother Hagai and his friend Dror Adani appealed their sentences for conspiring to assassinate Rabin and attack Arabs.

WORLD

Cuba Embargo

NEW YORK — The American Jewish Congress (AJC) is moving toward calling on the United States to end its decades-old economic sanctions against Cuba.

Such a move would break with the general Jewish position to stay on the sidelines of the issue.

AJC executive director Phil Baum said he could not say for certain that his group will formally call for an end to the embargo, but added, "My hunch is yes."

Unity Campaign

NEW YORK — Several Jewish organizations have teamed up to create a special Unity Campaign whose goal will be to raise $30 million over three years.

The United Jewish Appeal/Council of Jewish Federations Partnership; the Jewish Agency for Israel; and the Orthodox, Conservative and Reform streams of North American Judaism say the campaign is a unified response to the issue of religious tolerance in Israel.

Denaturalization Upheld

WASHINGTON — A federal appeals court has upheld a decision to strip a former member of a Lithuanian killing unit of his U.S. citizenship.

The court found that the battalion committed atrocities in Byelorussia (now Belarus), killing thousands of civilians, predominately Jews, and that there was evidence Kazys Ciurinskas personally took part in killing actions.

U.S. authorities said they will seek to have Ciurinskas removed from the United States as soon as possible.

Shanghai Shul

BEIJING — Just prior to U.S. President Bill Clinton's visit to China, the government completed long-sought restoration work on a synagogue located in the heart of Shanghai.

The shul, occupied for nearly 50 years by the state Education Commission, was built by Sephardi Jews in 1929 and used during World War II by about 25,000 Jewish refugees.

Far Right Fails

PRAGUE — A far-right party has failed to capture enough votes to enter the Czech parliament.

The Republican party, known for its anti-Gypsy and anti-Semitic rhetoric, polled only 3.9 percent during parliamentary elections last month. Political parties must claim at least five percent of the popular vote in order to be seated.

Zhirinovsky Appears

MOSCOW — Vladimir Zhirinovsky, the leader of the ultranationalist Liberal Democratic party, made a surprise appearance at a benefit concert for a Lubavitch synagogue here that was bombed last month.

After the concert, Zhirinovsky got up on stage and said he was outraged by the synagogue bombing, adding he would support any anti-vandalism bill brought before Russia's Parliament.

He also spoke positively about the Jewish contribution to Russian culture, economy and politics.

Canadian Selected

NEW YORK — Ari Feldman of Toronto is among 38 college and university students selected for an intensive six-week political internship run by the Orthodox Union's Institute for Public Affairs.

Feldman will intern at the National Jewish Democratic Council, a lobby group.

Bias Allegations Dismissed

TORONTO — A Canadian human rights tribunal has dismissed suggestions that one of its members is biased against Holocaust-denier Ernst Zundel.

In a written judgment released recently, the three-member panel stated that no reasonable person would doubt that panel member Reva Devins would be able to hear the case "in a fair and impartial manner."

The tribunal was responding to a submission by Zundel's lawyer, Doug Christie, that a purported May 13, 1988 news release by the Ontario Human Rights Commission (OHRC) cast doubt on Devins' impartiality. In the release, then OHRC chief commissioner Raj Anand applauds Zundel's jury conviction for distributing false news. That conviction was ultimately set aside when the Supreme Court of Canada struck down the false news law.

Christie had argued the OHRC's views can be imputed to Devins because at the time, she was a member of the organization.

The hearing can now continue. Zundel is contesting a complaint by Holocaust survivor Sabina Citron and the Toronto Mayor's Committee on Community and Race Relations that he operated an Internet Web site in violation of the Canadian Human Rights Act.

Canada takes lead to push for International Criminal Court

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In recent weeks, Canadian diplomats and lawmakers have enjoyed the plaudits of human rights advocates around the world as Canada leads the push to create a permanent International Criminal Court (ICC) to prosecute war criminals.

As delegates from 185 nations gathered in Rome to discuss creation of an ICC, Foreign Minister Lloyd Axworthy addressed them with a plea to remember the civilian victims of conflicts.

"We live in a world where most of the conflict is civil and most of the victims are civilian," Axworthy said. "The acts of war have become even more senseless and too often these acts of atrocity go unpunished. The time has come for us to build new institutions that respond to new needs."

On the one hand, Canada is taking a lead role in addressing the issue of international war criminals while at home its record leaves much to be desired. Canada did virtually nothing for 50 years to prosecute Nazi war criminals while as many as 500 modern day war criminals may have found a haven for themselves in Canada.

Compounding the irony is the fact that the United States, which has done more to bring Nazi war criminals to justice than any other democracy (it has removed 47 since 1979), is being seen as one of the powers placing obstacles in the way of an ICC.

Concerned about having members of its armed forces brought to court for political reasons, the United States has pushed for limitations on the independence of an international court.

In Canada, supporters for an international court include Jewish critics of the government's past efforts.

David Matas, legal coordinator for Amnesty International and a spokesperson on war crimes for B'nai Brith Canada, said the proposed international court "is a legacy the Holocaust has left." Though he agrees it is ironic that Canada is playing a leading role on the ICC, he said the Supreme Court of Canada decision in the Finta case has "hamstrung" domestic prosecutions of war criminals. That case dealt with allegations arising from the Holocaust, but it also impacts prosecutions of modern day war criminals, giving them the defence of following superior orders.

Even if Canada was "to get its act together" and amend the Criminal Code to remove that defence, "it's still only Canada's act." That would "only be a Canadian solution, not a worldwide solution," Matas said.

"In reality, Canada's failure is shared around the world. It's not as if Canada did badly and the rest of the world did well. The whole world is a haven for war criminals," Matas added.

An advisor to the Canadian delegation in Rome, Matas said Canada ought to change its criminal law to permit effective domestic prosecutions, but "changing the law would be easier to do if it was in the context of a global treaty. It sort of gives it momentum."

Irving Abella, a spokesperson for Canadian Jewish Congress on war crimes, agrees there is some irony in the current situation, though in recent years Canada's record on Nazi war criminals has improved.

He too is disappointed that Canada has yet to amend the Criminal Code to address the Finta decision even though Congress was assured four years ago that such steps were being taken."I'm not sure it'll ever come forward," he said.

"Canada sees the ICC as something that will remove the responsibility from Canada of dealing with modern day war criminals," Abella suggested. "Canada will have an outlet for them so they can ship them out to [another] venue" where they would face trial, he added.

Congress has supported domestic prosecutions of alleged war criminals as a first choice, with extradition to an international court as another viable alternative, he said. An international court might have better access to archival material, more witnesses to call upon and "a critical mass of cases" to try.

Furthermore, Abella continued, the two ad hoc international criminal courts in The Hague and in Tanzania, addressing war crimes in Bosnia and Rwanda, have been ineffective. In its four years in existence, the court in The Hague has registered only one conviction, he said.

A more effective legal mechanism with aggressive, professional and proactive staff is required, he said.

While the elements of an ICC are still being negotiated, one aspect of a new court worries York University law professor Anne Bayefsky.

"At this point, one has to be concerned about the proposed substantive rights on which people will be tried," she said.

In defining the wrongdoing covered by the court, suggestions are being forwarded to specifically include references to "settlements and occupied territories," she said.

"Some of the violations of rights that are tentative are being directed specifically towards Israel... At this point, there is some cause for concern... The question is what people will be tried for and would it be applicable to everyone."

Bayefsky, who heads York U's Centre for Refugee Studies, said she nevertheless favors creation of an international court. Such a body could coexist with a domestic approach to war crimes prosecutions, she suggested.

McGill law professor Irwin Cotler said an ICC would end the impunity enjoyed by most perpetrators of gross human abuses and violations of international humanitarian law.

An effective criminal court would also:

- provide relief to victims and end the possible stigma of collective guilt;
- counter the failure of national legal systems to punish offenders;
- ensure even-handedness in prosecutions and address accusations of political bias in choice of cases brought forward;
- provide an effective enforcement mechanism to punish perpetrators;
- deter genocide;
- serve as an international model of an effective justice system.

Changes in The CJN

The excitement and the sense of accomplishment each week at seeing a new edition of The CJN take shape from the varied and disparate sources of news, information, features, commentaries, opinions, analyses, press releases and photographs, has not abated.

I doubt it ever will.

Every Thursday afternoon, layout of the editorial content of the newspaper begins in earnest. By Monday the following week, also in the afternoon, it is completed, or, in uncharacteristically gentle journalist parlance, the paper is, at that point, put to bed.

To bring the paper to its "bedtime" every Monday, requires a highly focused, coordinated effort by a relatively small group of individuals in Montreal and Toronto.

It is a privilege to work with them.

They are seasoned, hard-working professionals, dedicated to collegiality and uncompromising standards of excellence, to the broad communal purposes of the paper, and to the journalistic ideals of truth, honesty, fairness and civility.

It is therefore very gratifying on behalf of this fine team, to have our work acknowledged by our peers. As the news item on the front page of the paper advises, The CJN recently received two such acknowledgments for 1997.

For the second, consecutive year the paper was named the best overall specialty publication by the Quebec Community Newspapers Association. and for the third consecutive year, The CJN won a Simon Rockower award from the American Jewish Press Association.

The Rockower award was for achieving excellence in special supplements, specifically for the supplement in the Rosh Hashanah issue called Zionism After 100 Years.

But even with the bestowal of these latest awards, indeed, in a sense because of them, we are implementing certain changes in the paper. July is the time when we have introduced changes in the past. This year is no exception.

Thus, beginning with this issue, readers of The CJN can look forward to the following changes.

• Bruce Elman, renowned expert in constitutional law at the Faculty of Law of the University of Alberta in Edmonton, will be replacing Shel Krakofsky.

Krakofsky is one of Canada's best poet/writers – witty, lyrical, insightful, and often achingly poignant. But his busy schedule could no longer bear the monthly CJN "intrusion."

Elman's contributions will be a total change of pace – observations from a completely different vantage point and a welcome, additional voice from the west.

• Jennifer Fox and Erica Horn will be replacing our two student voices, Viva Press and Justin Korda. Like Viva before her, Jennifer is also studying journalism at Dalhousie University in Halifax; and like Justin, Erica is a student at McGill University in Montreal.

• Once a month, on the inside back page, we will feature an advice column specifically directed at teenagers. The column will be called About Teenagers and will become part of the monthly rotation along with our other advice columns. The author is Karilani. In fact, Karilani is a composite name for three young authors who are girls, close friends and about to enter Grade 11 in September. They will be writing for teenagers about teenagehood and teenage problems. Letters to Karilani will be welcomed.

• Once a month on our Jewish Life pages, we will publish a feature called Through a Sephardi Window. The aim of this new column will be twofold: to provide a print medium for discussion and debate of issues of more particular concern to members of the Sephardi community and, in so doing, to provide an opportunity to the wider community to become more familiar with and more understanding of those issues and in the process learn about Sephardi lore, traditions, customs and folktales.

• In the near future, we will also be making significant changes to our coverage of news from Israel and the Jewish world.

Our commitment to our readers is to constantly strive to take the paper higher and further; to reach new audiences; to gather the news from newer sources; to discuss new subjects; to bring new insights and to introduce new voices; in short, to try, always, to make the paper even better.

Almost three years ago, I wrote that it was my aspiration for The CJN that "our readers... will look upon the paper as a precious lifeline of information about a kinfolk dispersed to the far corners of the vast earth." In an age when there are so many different sources of information, it may be foolish to think of any newspaper as being a lifeline. But it is indeed my fervent hope that our readers will think of The CJN as being precious. —MBD

CJC backs new rabbinic group to promote unity

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A council of rabbis representing every denomination should be set up in Canadian Jewish communities in order to strengthen Jewish communal unity.

This resolution was adopted June 24 by the new council of Ontario region, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), at its first meeting.

The CJC was asked to set up a council of rabbis, whose members would visit various synagogues in their comunity to denounce the use of faith to create schisms.

The resolution passed with a large majority after delegate Sol Hermolin got little support for his suggestion that the council include secular representation since it would deal with ideological matters.

A parallel resolution that the CJC set up an in-house, yet arm's length mechanism and arbitration process for solving non-rabbinical or secular legal issues was also adopted, without discussion.

The meeting included the first report by the region's new chair, Keith Landy, and a brief talk by Isabel Bassett, Ontario minister of citizenship, culture and recreation.

"I want to continue our long traditional support for the Jewish community," said Bassett, referring to her late husband, John, and his commitment to Israel. This remark brought applause from council members.

When presented with a book on Israel's 50th anniversary by region officer Ellen Coles, Bassett said, "I have visited Israel many times and I want my children to grow up with the same feeling that John and I had."

There is an economic basis for the close relationship between Israel and Ontario, the minister said, with imports of Israeli wine, diamonds and electronic items.

She promised a quicker resolution of complaints to the Ontario Human Rights Commission.

In his presentation, Landy said, "Although we are regarded as a wealthy community, approximately 13 percent of us live below the poverty line. Our community agencies need the funding and government resources to enable them to provide the social services that our community continues to need."

Landy said he has asked the CJC to establish a joint CJC-UJA Federation committee to act as an advocate on issues of social policy.

The council adopted a resolution calling for accessibility to the CJC National Archives if the CJC moves from the Bronfman building in Montreal.

New vice-chairs for the region are Esther Bem, Harold Brief and Esta Pomotov from Toronto, and Paul Walman from Kitchener. Cary Green was acclaimed national vice-president from the Ontario region.

Ted Hochberg of Windsor and Ron Wolfe of London are the Federation respresentatives for their communities to the regional officers.

Skinhead gets enhanced sentence for attack

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The sentence-enhancing provisions of the Criminal Code were invoked recently as a Toronto skinhead was sentenced to 18 months in jail for a racist assault on a black man as well as two arresting officers.

Ontario Court Judge Hugh Porter sentenced Quinn McFarlane to 12 months in jail in addition to the six months he had already served from the time of his arrest.

Porter said he was using his discretion to increase the sentence McFarlane would otherwise have received because of the racial motivation of the crime.

Prior to sentencing, Porter heard from Bernie Farber of Canadian Jewish Congress on the deterrent affect of stiff sentences on young people associated with racist movements, and he viewed a videotape of McFarlane and others protesting against Roma (Gypsy) refugees outside a Toronto motel last summer.

Farber afterwards applauded the jail time handed out to McFarlane. "It gives an important message to society generally and more specifically to young people... They are impressed that the courts and police are beginning to take hate crimes seriously."

McFarlane is no stranger to the legal system – nor to Farber. Last April, McFarlane was convicted of assaulting CFTO-TV reporter John Lancaster outside a University Avenue courthouse after Lancaster had gone to help a cameramen that McFarlane had attacked. Lancaster suffered a broken nose and teeth in the assault. McFarlane avoided a jail sentence in that case when Ontario Court judge Mary Hogan ordered McFarlane to receive counselling from Farber – a move that caught Farber completely by surprise.

Farber said he had no prior knowledge he would be asked to be involved in McFarlane's rehabilitation but he said he would cooperate if McFarlane genuinely wanted to turn his life around. Since that sentence in April, he has not heard from McFarlane. "I assume he's not interested," he said.

McFarlane, 19, has been associated with various elements in the white supremacy movement, in particular with the Aryan Blitzkrieg, a skinhead group centred in Scarborough that has ties to a Polish skinhead group, said Sgt. Dino Doria of the Metro Toronto police hate crimes unit.

He is also facing hate promotion charges connected to the anti-Roma protest last August. That trial begins in September. Altogether, McFarlane has a history of trouble with the law. He has 18 prior criminal convictions, 10 of which involved violence, Doria said.

In other developments, 44-year-old Mark Harding was found guilty last week of three counts of promoting hatred against Muslims. The charges arose out of a pamphleteering campaign by Harding in which he distributed "degrading" anti-Muslim material outside Weston Collegiate claiming Muslims were terrorists, Doria said.

One of the counts was in connection to a telephone hotline Harding operated, he added.

Harding had been supported by a U.S. group called Truth Seekers, with one member of the group attending the early stages of his case in Toronto. The group is fundamentalist Christian in nature but the group's representative backed off from support of Harding when he learned of Canada's anti-hate laws.

Harding will be sentenced on July 15.

Israeli street named for Sklar

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For Lou Sklar, it may as well be Fifth Avenue, Downing Street and Sunset Boulevard rolled into one.

After all, how many people (living, that is) have a street named for them in Israel, where roadways tend to be named after deceased Zionists or biblical figures?

In mid-May, a beaming Sklar, the retired president of furniture manufacturer Sklar-Peppler, unfurled the banner on Lou Sklar Street, in the Israeli city of Or-Yehuda.

It was a fitting cap to Sklar's decade of involvement in the city, whose near-miraculous recovery from poverty and squalor he helped bring about.

Or-Yehuda was among the beneficiaries of Project Renewal, a grand scheme launched by Israel in the early 1980s. The idea was to get Diaspora communities to help problem municipalities in Israel by "adopting" them.

Or-Yehuda, situated on the outskirts of Lod Airport, was a hard-scrabble town of 20,000 then. It began in 1948 as a tent city of mainly Sephardi families, and became a sad place where poverty, crime and dependence on government hand-outs reigned.

The town was adopted by small Jewish communities in Ontario (except for Toronto and Ottawa) and by Jews in Atlantic Canada. Sklar was then living in Oshawa.

He immediately took a leadership role, and estimates he took 25 trips to the town between 1980 and the early '90s.

Sklar worked closely with local officials, United Israel Appeal (UIA) of Canada, and with the Jewish community of Milwaukee, which also adopted parts of the town. He estimates that over the decade, Or-Yehuda was infused with roughly $10 million in capital.

The money was used to launch new social, educational and recreational programs. And with matching government funds, open sewers were cleaned up, and new homes, parks and schools were built.

Sklar also convinced local officials to make loans available to residents so they could buy their own homes. That led to pride of ownership.

"At first there was a lot of hostility," Sklar, 74, recalls. "They didn't like the idea of this Canadian Ashkenazi interfering. We ruffled a few feathers. But we got the job done."

Indeed, Or-Yehuda became one of the shining successes of Project Renewal. Today, it's a city of 30,000, and crime, welfare, poverty, drop-out and even infant mortality rates have dropped dramatically.

"Now, people want to move there," Sklar notes with pride.

Leo Marcus, who headed the Canadian office of UIA in Jerusalem in the early '80, says Sklar is the first living Canadian to get a street named for him in Israel, and possibly, the only living member of the entire Diaspora to be so honored.

Sklar says he never had a bar mitzvah, and is considering celebrating a belated one in Or-Yehuda, not far from "his" street.

Memorial book planned

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A total of $11,500 has been raised by veterans and their family and friends for the Canadian Jewish Book of Remembrance.

The Book of Remembrance, which will honor the 522 Jewish Canadians who gave their lives to serve Canada in this century, is being published by the Canadian Jewish War Memorial Association. The association would like to hear from families of these veterans.

A budget for the project is estimated at $70,000. In order to complete and publish the memorial book, all members of the Jewish community are asked to contribute.

"Time is not on our side," said Oscar Adler, association president. "We promised our fallen comrades that we will remember them. This is what the Jewish Book of Rembrance is all about. It is also a legacy for generations to come."

Donations are eligible for income tax deduction and may be sent to the Canadian Jewish War Memorial Association, 640 Sheppard Avenue East, Apt. 602, Toronto, M2K 1B8. Call 225-4276.

Sod turned at Lubavitch Centre

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

VAUGHAN — Stones from the base of the Temple Mount will be placed in the cornerstone of the Ernest Manson Lubavitch Centre, to be built in a new housing development at Bathurst and Flamingo Road in Vaughan.

Sod was turned on a scorching Sunday morning in June, shortly before the fourth yahrzeit of the Lubavitcher Rebbe, Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson. Rabbi Schneerson encouraged the establishment of Lubavitch centres in all developing areas.

Wielding shovels were municipal, provincial and federal government officials; supporters of the new centre; the family of Ernest Manson, who donated the two acres of land; Rabbi Baruch Taub, of nearby Beth Avraham Yoseph Congregation; Rabbi Yitzchok Kerzner of Toronto's Clanton Park Synagogue; and at the end, anyone else who wanted a turn.

Rabbi Mendel Kaplan, spiritual leader of the Manson Centre, said that the new facility will "join Lubavitch centres spanning the globe," as well as more than 10 centres in the Greater Toronto Area.

Rabbi Kaplan said that he hopes that construction will begin this summer on the over 20,000 sq. ft. two-story centre, which will have a large synagogue, a chapel, kitchen, gym/social hall, pre-school, offices, lecture halls and a mikvah.

"While we will be concentrating on programs for youth, we want to serve the entire community, older people too," he said.

Some classes have already begun in peoples' homes he said, and plans are underway to begin a regular minyan. High Holy Day services will be held at Rosedale Heights Elementary School.

The Manson Centre is part of a world-wide campaign to bring Yiddishkeit to every Jew, Rabbi Zalman Grossbaum, executive vice-president of Chabad Lubavitch of Southern Ontario, told the crowd of over 100.

Greetings were brought by Moshe Ronen, president of Canadian Jewish Congress; Elinor Caplan, MP for York North, the riding in which the new centre is located; Lorna Jackson, mayor of Vaughan; and Susan Kadis, local councillor. Also on the dais were Monte Kwinter, MPP from Wilson Hts.; and Senator Jerry Grafstein.

TORAH DONATED TO CHABAD

O Canada

Yesterday was Canada Day. The country entered its 132nd year as a free, democratic country. It is not a perfect place, by any means. Nor will it be until all its children have adequate shelter, nourishment, educational opportunity and health care; or until there are no longer any individuals seeking warmth above an airflow grate on the streets during the ice-cold nights of winter; or until the very last, racist smear has passed the lips of the intolerant and the bigoted.

But it's more perfect than most places on earth, although most Canadians do not usually talk about it. We seem to be satisfied merely to "feel" it with personal, but unarticulated satisfaction. Occasionally, when travelling in other parts of the world, we may even allow ourselves to think it, but seldom out loud, and generally not in mixed, that is with non-Canadian, company.

But people outside the country like to talk about this nearly perfect place and frequently do, especially for example, at the United Nations, where year after year, Canada is esteemed to have one of the highest qualities of life anywhere on the globe. Indeed, a walk through any of the large cities in this country offers palpable, visible proof that more and more people are arriving at Canada's shores elated at the chance to join the exhilarating national enterprise we call nation-building even as, in some cases, they must struggle to build new lives for themselves and their families.

Canada pulsates with endless social, educational, cultural, medical, scientific and economic possibilities. But to realize those possibilities, to make them more than far-off, chimeral mirages for Canadians, we must constantly recommit to our ennobling democratic values. We must constantly recommit to the great founding belief, the distinguishing moral conviction of this country that government very definitely has a vital and appropriate role to play in trying to better the lives of its citizens.

We must also constantly recommit to the battle to preserve it.

Canada's 132nd year promises to be very stressful. The unity of the country is not assured. More accurately, it is at a precarious crossroad. There may be an election in Quebec this year. There may also be a referendum. There will certainly be a judgment rendered by the Supreme Court on the question of whether Quebec has the right to unilaterally secede from Canada, whether, that is, Quebec has the right to unilaterally destroy Canada.

When the judges speak on that matter, separatist passions will flow like a raging river after the springtime thaw.

"Canada" is a Huron Iroquois word meaning village or settlement. What is a settlement, if not a place where people choose to live together, a place where people unite for the common good, protecting one another, taking responsibility one for the other, a place of security, of acceptance and of belonging? Those of us who believe in Canada's possibilities and in the possibility of Canada as an ideal settlement, will be called upon to speak out and act on its behalf.

We might all follow the example of Rabbi Reuven Bulka in Ottawa. He has written a prayer for Canada that is regularly recited in his congregation, Machzikei Hadas. It is brief, compact and very much to the point. We believe deeply in the possibility of Canada. We therefore urge other congregations to incorporate Rabbi Bulka's prayer for Canada into their services.

"May God, Who has blessed our patriarchs and matriarchs, bestow blessing upon the governor-general, the prime minister, and the government of Canada; grant them wisdom and courage in these challenging times; bless them with the wisdom to properly guide our beloved country; imbue them with courage in their efforts to strengthen Canada. And may we all together continue to experience Canada resolute in its togetherness and cooperative in its diversity." Amen.

There could be no worthier, more meaningful celebration of Canada Day as we head into the 132nd year.

Jewish vital records of Poland on internet

Ze'ev Glicenstein (Roots & Remembrances, CJN, June 11) refers to the microfilms of the Jewish vital records of Konin, Poland, which are available from the Mormon Family History Centres. The index listings to over 1,100 of these very same Konin records – from 1866 to 1873 – are available to anyone with Internet access. They can be searched at the Jewish Records Indexing (JRI)-Poland site at [http://www. jewishgen.org/jri-p].

The JRI-Poland database now contains index listings to more than 300,000 vital records from over 90 cities and shtetls of Poland. More records are added every month.

The goal of JRI-Poland is to create a searchable database to the indices of all available Jewish vital records from current and former territories of Poland. The indexing is done by volunteers with an interest in individual towns. They join together in "Shtetl Co-ops" under a leader responsible for coordinating their efforts.

JRI-Poland was launched in 1995 and is already the largest database of Jewish vital records accessible through the Internet.

Need for street protests on education

Mazel tov to the UJA Planners of this year's walkathon. Funds for our denominational schools and other causes were raised through a pleasurable parade along an interesting route, culminating at beautiful Ontario Place. I was also delighted to see so many of my "frum" friends participating.

Perhaps the same skilled UJA planners could also organize a series of similar parades but more like '60s-style, American, grassroots, civil rights protests. If successful, and all things being equal, ultimately we will have more funds for our communities' other needy causes. If only we can draw attention to our governments' unfair discrimination against equal funding for our (and others') denominational schools.

A key lesson of the 50th anniversary celebrations is that at the very least, vigorous civil rights protesting is more effective than foolishly dancing before the King.

Sees hypocrisy in Palestinian stand

Until about 50 years ago, there were about 750,000 Jews living in Arab nations. At the present time, these 20-odd nations are virtually "Judenrein!" No western nation condemned these Arab nations for carrying out "ethnic cleansing" or practising "racism."

Currently, the Palestinian Authority (PA) has stated that when Israel turns over additional land to PA control, then all inhabitants of Jewish settlements will have to leave, as Jews cannot live in areas under their control. Again the western nations remain silent!

Palestinian leaders are accusing Israel of "racism" because it is planning to maintain the present relationship between the two major population groups presently living in Jerusalem.

What utter hypocrisy! And what is even worse is that the western nations will probably support their victims! Shame on the leaders of these nations!

A. Noodelman
Montreal

Editor's note: Our information is that the status of the Jewish settlements within the territory controlled by the PA remains a subject for negotiations.

Eating disorders have Jewish connection

I would like to thank you very much for your publication of the article concerning Esther Kane and her thesis on the Jewish connection to eating disorders. (CJN, June 11).

The constant familial emphasis on appearance and food are just two examples of the elements that intensify the problem within our culture. However, there is very little, if any, public acknowledgement within the community of this devastating state of affairs. Hopefully, with articles such as this, the walls around this subject can be broken and recovery can begin for many.

Press coverage of 50th anniversary a mixed blessing

In his column, CJN editor Mordechai Ben-Dat has written effusively of the western world's extraordinary coverage of Israel's 50th anniversary. Indeed this has been no different throughout the country's 50 years. Yet there is an opposing view in Judaism that Israel should maintain a low profile among the nations of the world. Jews have known throughout our history that when non-Jews focus too much on ourselves, it only instigates hatred and jealousy, especially today in the Arab and Islamic worlds.

Whatever happened to our historical culture of privacy and secrecy? Consider the very first act of Moses, the greatest prophet among the Jews, in the Book of Exodus. When Moses saw an Egyptian smiting a Jew, as prudent conduct, he looked all around him before killing the Egyptian.

Cast me not away

"Al tashlicheini b'et ziknah," "Cast me not away when I become old." It is a poignant cry, some thousands of years old. Obviously the temptation to discard the elderly has a long and infamous history. It is not confined to the late 20th century in North America.

By Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Last weekend, our synagogue celebrated seniors' Shabbat. The audience was a miniature of Jewish life through 80-plus years of Canadian Jewry. We often look with anxiety around the congregation, worried that not enough young couples with small children are joining the shul and bringing the next generation to our family of congregants. How rarely do we think about the strength we have in our senior members.

The speaker was a well-known and respected physician – a pioneer woman doctor who came here from the east when, as she said, her family wept because they would never see her again once she left Montreal. Added to that, they feared that once she crossed the Rockies she risked Indian attacks. Her stories were of early Jewish Victoria and Vancouver.

Two dozen Jewish families kept the Victoria synagogue going in the "dirty '30s" when she arrived, she said. The shul leaked and was freezing. Vancouver, where they found many more Jews and after World War II a community that doubled quickly, seemed like a better bet than Victoria to the young medical couple.

According to the speaker, many servicemen, having tasted West Coast living (and this was before Starbucks and sushi), returned with their families to make Vancouver flourish.

At one point, she reminisced, people broke off from our Vancouver congregation because we were too religious, and they formed their own congregation. Then people broke off to form their own shul because we were not religious enough! But this made us stronger, and it's good to have more than one opinion, she said.

She did not speak at all about the difficulties of being a woman doctor and a Jew, in days when discrimination against both was rife in the Canadian medical community. She spoke about the joys of community and the strong leaders who built it. It was a wonderful celebration of lives well-lived.

Without naming names, let me share some of the other stories contained in that room – and these are only the stories I know. Many more, I am sure, could be told.

One woman was in the Canadian Armed Forces during World War II. She spent many years as a volunteer for the Red Cross.

Survivors of that war in the audience who came to Vancouver added their strength to the community. Some survived Siberia, others the camps. Among them were many who have told their stories to high school students at the Holocaust symposia, and at least one who led in creating sponsorship groups for the Vietnamese boat people.

Absent from the congregation was a man whom many remembered, Rabbi Pastinsky, the first rabbi to live permanently in Vancouver and make it his own special place. Available any time of the day or night for his Jews, he opened his doors to anyone who needed him. He is gone, but one of his bar mitzvah students was there to remember him.

In one of Tony Hillerman's detective stories set among the Navajo in the American southwest, his policeman Jim Chee encounters a retirement home. He is mystified by the white men's practice of putting their elders in homes away from family and community. In his tradition, elders are respected leaders and when frail, they become the responsibility of their children.

For various reasons, we too have built retirement villages, indeed whole cities, where elders live apart from the rest of the community – golden age ghettos, if you will, for both the well and the infirm.

Maybe we can't go back to our parents' generation, when grandparents lived with their children. In my case, it was the widows who came to live with us until their deaths. Many families will no longer assume this duty.

But we should not abandon the stories of strength and courage of our elders. Canada's aboriginal peoples could teach us something here. Where their culture is strong, they know the value of elders' stories and their memory of the tribe. It was a pleasure to sit in shul and hear stories of the tribe and feel them reverberate with all the other stories in that room.

Near the end of the doctor's talk, my neighbor leaned over to me and whispered, "It's too bad there aren't more young people to hear this." How right she was. Rather than think of elders as having nothing to offer, our children could have laughed, and cried, with the speaker. It is for them that we save our stories and hope someday they will be heard.

Love and hate, side by side

Jews love Jews, and at the same time they also hate them.

This is one of the themes that Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz propounds in a memorable address given not long ago in Jerusalem. The rabbi is one of the leading talmudic scholars of our century. His commentaries and translations of the Talmud have won him worldwide recognition. Once a year, many of his supporters gather in Jerusalem to honor him for his achievements and on these occasions, he has given memorable addresses. His most recent one was no exception.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Here are some quotations that we might well take into consideration:

"In the past few years, a relatively new phenomenon has arisen: the legitimacy of hatred. Mutual hatred among Jews is no longer a thing that one is ashamed to express publicly. On the contrary, it has almost become a fashionable attitude. This hatred cuts through all sectors."

Rabbi Steinsaltz cites examples of Jews stereotyping other Jews. If you want to insult someone, call him "leftist," "Reform," "haredi," "settler," and you have expressed your fundamental hatred. He then goes on to characterize such feelings that, he fears, will lead to a permanent kind of internal separation, where people do not even live together but are separate from one another and know each other only from a distance.

"From time to time, declarations (both sincere and insincere) are made about the need for unity. Life and emotion, too, create aspects of closeness and togetherness. The wars, and the hostility that surrounds us, create a ring of blood and fire that welds us together and becomes more tangible in times of calamity. And, despite all the differences, people still go through certain things together, speak to each other, do business with each other, and even marry each other.

"But along with all of that, hostility and hatred keep growing, and above all, there is alienation. There is an increasing tendency to move into separate cities or isolated neighborhoods and create ghettos: a haredi ghetto, a national-religious ghetto, a Sephardi ghetto, a Russian ghetto, a secular ghetto, a socialist ghetto. And in each one of these ghettos, people live together, support each other, reinforcing their faith and their lifestyles, and creating reservoirs of ferment and estrangement from, and hatred towards, everybody else."

Are scholars exempt? Rabbi Steinsaltz does not think so: "Those who rely upon books and writers seek and find (and sometimes even invent) proof and evidence on why it is right to believe like this, and why the hostility, the hatred, the split, are justified."

This is a dreary recitation of ills, but the rabbi is not altogether disheartened. He believes that deep down, in addition to Divine love for us as a people, there is also Jewish love for other Jews.

I fear what the rabbi fears, but I also hope with him that each one of us in his or her own community can do something about this, as a member of the community as well as an individual, and do so by deeds and not merely by pious acclamation.

We must recognize courts' role in democracy

Recently, I participated in a conference entitled Litigating the Values of a Nation, organized by the Canada-Israel Legal Cooperation Programme (CILCP) – a consortium of three Canadian law schools, Mc Gill University, University of Alberta and the University of Toronto, working in partnership with Israeli universities. This symposium, held at Tel Aviv University, brought together judges, academics and lawyers from Canada and Israel to exchange ideas on constitutional theory, law and politics.

By Bruce Elman in Edmonton

Justice Aharon Barak, president of the Israel Supreme Court is always an active participant at the CILCP colloquia. This year's meeting was no exception, as Barak delivered two interesting and provocative papers. However, one thing was different this year, and for those of us who love the wonderful informality of the Israeli judiciary, it was most disturbing: Barak is now accompanied by a bodyguard whenever he is in public, and his apartment is guarded by a soldier.

Unlike, perhaps, other Israeli leaders, the concern is not that Barak will be the object of an attack by Arab extremists or foreign agents. The worry is that he may be attacked by other Jewish Israelis who disagree with his judicial decisions. Virtually every week, the Court, or Barak personally, is verbally attacked in the Knesset, in the media and in the public discourse generally. Seemingly, the Court, and particularly Barak, are being vilified for doing exactly what judges are supposed to do: namely interpret the laws of the land in an objective and independent way.

What set off these attacks on the Court and Barak? Their origin lies in the two new Basic Laws on Freedom of Occupation and Human Dignity and Freedom passed by the Knesset in 1992. Israel does not have a constitution, even though the Declaration of Independence indicates that a constitution was to be a high priority for the new nation. Instead, a set of Basic Laws have been produced to cover most of the important institutions of government. The two new Basic Laws were the first to deal with individual rights. These laws have been amended and re-enacted. The model for these Basic Laws was, apparently, the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

The Israel Supreme Court, led by Barak, view it as the role and responsibility of the Court to protect basic human rights and freedoms by breathing life into the skeletal provisions of the Basic Laws. The Court has, admittedly, been very active and forceful about it. This has infuriated some Israelis – particularly politicians – who believe that the appointed members of the Court have no business overturning decisions of the elected members of the Knesset. Does this have a familiar ring?

It sounds very much like the rhetoric which followed the Supreme Court of Canada's decision in the Vriend case. In that decision, authored by Justice Frank Iacobucci, the Supreme Court of Canada ordered the Alberta government to include "sexual orientation" as a prohibited ground of discrimination under the Alberta human rights provisions. The vitriolic nature of the rhetoric that followed the decision was so alarming that even Alberta Premier Ralph Klein expressed some concern about it.

It is, I believe, fair to say that much of the criticism has come from individuals who simply do not like specific decisions of the Court. Instead of openly debating the merits of the case, however, these critics seek to undermine the stature and credibility of the Court by attacking the legitimacy of the Courts' decision-making power.

Nonetheless, the Canadian Charter of Rights and the Israeli Basic Laws were democratically and legally adopted and now represent the supreme law of their respective countries. The Parliament of Canada and the legislatures of the provinces and the Knesset are no longer supreme; the Charter and the Basic Laws limit their authority and power. It should be remembered that this decision to make the "Constitution" the supreme law of the land was the decision of politicians democratically chosen by the people. Furthermore, the legislatures in both Israel and Canada have a "notwithstanding clause" which can immunize government legislation against judicial review.

But this is what it means to have a constitutional democracy. The Constitution is supreme and it is the role of the judiciary to ensure that it remains so. This is exactly what both the Israel Supreme Court and the Supreme Court of Canada are doing. They should not be criticized for fulfilling their proper role in a democratic state.

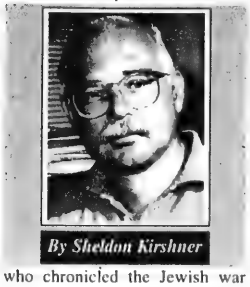
The Kirshner File

One of the wonders of the world

The Dead Sea has fascinated human beings since time immemorial.

Flavius Josephus, the historian



By Sheldon Kirshner

who chronicled the Jewish war against the Romans, was amazed by its changing colors. "...thrice daily it alters its appearance and reflects the sun's rays with varying tints," he rhapsodized.

Strabo, the Roman geographer, was intrigued by its buoyancy, and noted: "The water is exceedingly heavy, so that no person can dive into it."

Mark Twain, the American novelist, sighted the lake through the perpetual haze and wrote: "Here we feel the oppressive atmosphere of this desolate region."

Lying east of Jerusalem, in a rift which forms the lowest place on earth, the Dead Sea has become the stuff of legend, its image etched into the consciousness of history by the biblical story of Sodom and Gemorrah.

Much maligned and often misunderstood by early visitors, the Dead Sea has drawn a diverse body of travellers. They have been motivated by religious fervor, simple curiosity and scientific interest.

Known as the Salt Sea (Yam Ha-Melach) in Hebrew and the Stinking Lake in Arabic, the Dead Sea is a lifeless expanse of water, one third solid and 10 times more saline than the Mediterranean. In terms of mineral content, it is unique, being composed largely of magnesium chloride, sodium chloride, calcium chloride, potassium chloride and magnesium bromide, all of which give off a peculiar, heady odor.

Not surprisingly, the Dead Sea has been the subject of numerous books and essays, but one of the best of the lot is Barbara's Kreiger's excellently-researched and literate account, The Dead Sea: Myth, History, and Politics (University Press of New England). Originally published two decades ago, it has now been reissued in a paperback edition burnished by quaint woodcuts and utilitarian black-and-white photographs.

The book is weighed heavily in favor of the 19th century explorers who, at the risk to their lives, painstakingly surveyed the lake, which was jealously guarded by fierce Bedouin tribes. From there, Kreiger goes on to discuss its economic usefulness, its connection with agriculture, its receding nature and its association with tourism.

As she tells it, the first European explorer to travel completely around the Dead Sea in the last century (1806) was the German naturalist Ulrich Jasper Seetzen. He was soon followed by John Lewis Burckhardt, who rediscovered the ancient Nabatean city of Petra in what is now Jordan.

In 1835, Christopher Costigan was the first modern traveller to sail on the lake, and his tale of hardship came to epitomize its mythological qualities.

By Kreiger's reckoning, the most ambitious and famous expedition was mounted by William Francis Lynch, an American army officer, in 1848. Lynch, in his journal, recounted the arduous journey down the treacherous rapids of the Jordan River. He observed its rich bird life and expressed amazement at the tiger tracks he had stumbled upon. Beholding the lake, he described it as a "huge cauldron, its surface shrouded by a lead colored mist."

Lynch and his party explored the lake for three weeks, dredging up samplings from its floor and compiling details of its topography, winds and currents and atmospheric conditions. His findings were the basis for much of the research done on the Dead Sea well into the 20th century.

Indeed, more than a century would elapse before the Dead Sea was subjected to what would be the most exhaustive and systematic study of its physical, chemical and geological aspects. This survey was conducted by an American/Israeli team in 1959, when the Dead Sea's western shore was still shared by Israel and Jordan.

By the mid-19th century, as information about it reached a wider reading public, there was a corresponding interest in the botany, zoology and geology of the mountainous terrain around the lake. Surprised at how little had been written about the wildlife of Palestine, the Englishman Henry Baker Tristram embarked on a tour that would result in the publication of his landmark work, The Land of Israel.

During the course of his travels, he visited Ein Gedi, which was and would remain one of the allures of the Dead Sea, and Masada, the desert redoubt where Jewish zealots held a Roman army at bay.

Potash, of course, has long been one of the valuable minerals extracted from the lake, and Kreiger credits a Russian Jewish mining engineer, Mikhail (Moshe) Novomeysky, with being instrumental in exploiting its potential.

He opened two plants, but lost the first at Qalya to the Arab Legion during the 1948 Arab-Israeli war, and the second at the foot of Mt. Sedom to a nationalization decree issued by Israel in 1952. The latter, renamed the Dead Sea Works, nearly folded. But by the 1980s, the plant was producing about two million tons of potash per year, trailing behind Canada, the Soviet Union, East Germany and the United States in output.

As Kreiger points out, the attraction of the Dead Sea valley transcended mining. In 1938, the first farming settlement, Beit Ha-Aravah, was established on its shores. It was a stunning success. Within two years, the kibbutzniks were growing much-prized winter tomatoes and cultivating fishponds. Beit Ha-Aravah, however, was evacuated during the War of Independence. Nineteen years would pass before the ruins of the kibbutz fell into Israel's hands again.

Tourism is a major factor of the Dead Sea's economy today. The therapeutic qualities of the mineral springs and of the lake itself are well documented. Since Israel's 1994 peace treaty with Jordan, there has been a hotel building boom on both sides of the lake, notably at Ein Bokek, Ein Gedi, Suweimeh and Zarah.

In 1980, the Israeli government announced grandiose plans to build a canal from the Mediterranean to the Dead Sea to harness hydroelectric energy. The project was shelved six years later, a casualty of financial considerations.

Israeli conservation programs have restored the leopard and the ibex to their natural habitat in the craggy landscapes of the Dead Sea. And while I have never spotted an elusive leopard during my ramblings, I have been fortunate enough to have seen the graceful ibex.

Kreiger reports that, in the last half century, the surface of the Dead Sea has receded by one-third, leaving the Dead Sea Works stranded at the far end of a muddy, salt-encrusted plain. But, citing scientific data, she is sanguine about its future, certain it will not disappear. Let us hope that the Dead Sea will never vanish. It truly is one of the wonders of the world.

Transmitting our values

By RABBI ELIE KARFUNKEL

I am convinced that Jewish teenagers today have more obstacles to overcome to maintain their Jewish identity than ever before. The social pressures around tobacco, drugs and immoral behavior are too constant and intense for many of our children. What might have been discussed with an 18-year-old not more than 20 years ago, now has to be discussed with 12- and 13-year-olds.

Add to this the fact that many adults have failed to provide guidance and behave as proper role models. A teenager once reasoned with me that he was no worse than the president of the United States. The president has committed the three cardinal sins of the '90s. He smokes a cigar and doesn't deny it. He admits to have smoked pot (but claims he didn't inhale), and he admitted to being unfaithful (at least one time with Gennifer Flowers). "And he's the president of the United States!" argued the teen. "All I want to do is be a lawyer!"

Unfortunately, the problem goes deeper. The value system of the secular world is deteriorating. No one can argue this point. However, we as Jews are expected to insulate ourselves from the moral decay of the world and be a light unto the nations. How many of us fall into the trap of the immoral ways of our society and often forgo the truly meaningful things in life to which we should aspire?

Aside from taking care that we act properly as Jews, we have the added responsibility of transmitting our values to the next generation. This is quite a daunting task, considering the environment in which we are raising our children today. The week's parshah, Chukat, offers a meaningful insight underlining the importance of passing down our beliefs to future generations.

'Innermost garments'

Moses is told by God (20; 19) to take the garments of the high priest, Aaron, and place them on Eliezer, Aaron's son, who would succeed him. The rabbis tell us that Eliezer put the clothing on in the order that Aaron removed them. This poses a problem. If Eliezer placed the garments on himself as his father took them off, he would be putting the outer garments on first and the inner garments on the outside, instead of wearing them in their proper order.

The Ramban (Nachmonides) explains that a miracle took place, and God put the clothing in the right order. This was to ensure that the clothing closest to Aaron's heart, symbolic of the values he held most dear, would also be closest to the heart of Eliezer, thereby transmitting the ideals of father to son.

We must accept the responsibility of transmitting the traditions and laws of Judaism to our children. Beautiful Jewish celebrations, Shabbat meals and attending services in the synagogue are vital to our religion, yet they are just the externals. They must be coupled with Torah and mitzvot, humility and reverence. How much more meaningful a Shabbat meal would be if the conversation shifted from Roger Clements to the weekly parshah. A bar mitzvah would be more significant if both father and son put tfillin on the next morning. Suddenly our teens would have an alternative to the secular culture that surrounds them.

By raising our level of commitment, we will be able to successfully transmit our "innermost garments" to our children, who will hopefully accept them and place them close to their hearts. In this way both generations will fulfil the eternal message of what it means to be b'nai Aharon (sons of Aaron.)

Israeli soccer on the web

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

It has the power to divide families in Jerusalem. To test the very strictest of allegiances in Tel Aviv. And to stir up deep rivalries in Haifa. What is it? Soccer, of course.

Right now, the planet is focussed on France as 32 teams vie for the World Cup. Unfortunately, none of those teams is from Israel. So in order to give Israeli soccer its place in the sun, here are some links to Israel's national obsession.

Israel's National Soccer Team maintains quite an elaborate home page [http://www.geocities.com/Colosseum/Field/9719/frame_e.htm]. The team has a long history. The first international game took place on March 16, 1934, in Cairo, when Palestine lost to Egypt 1-7. The team's best achievement was when it competed in the World Cup in Mexico in 1970. It managed to tie Sweden 1-1, scoring Israel's only goal in a World Cup tournament.

Although it may not be an international powerhouse, the Israeli national team can still pack a few surprises. Just this year, Israel scored a stunning victory against the very strong Argentinian team [http://www.jpost.com/com/Archive/16.Apr.1998/Sports/Article-0.html].

What about the team's future? You can read up on Israel's chances as it prepares to compete at the European Championship in 2000 [http://www.geocities.com/TelevisionCity/7460/nivheret.htm].

Judging from the number of Web sites, there is no shortage of fans for Israel's domestic soccer teams. You can visit the 1997-98 League Champions Beitar Jerusalem [http://www.beitar-jerusalem.org.il/], Maccabi Haifa [http://www.football.co.il/] and Maccabi Petach Tikvah [http://www.geocities.com/Colosseum/Field/1194/mpt.htm] to find photos, stories and stats about your favorite team. You can even find video clips at the Hapoel Haifa site [http://www.hapoel-haifa.org.il/].

There are dozens more Israeli football sites at Maven [http://www.maven.co.il/subjects/idx293.htm], Israeli Football Links [http://members.tripod.com/~macfa/links.htm], and don't miss the best all-around site: Michael Medved's Soccer Services [http://www.geocities.com/Colosseum/5948/menu.htm] which has an overview of the history of the game in Israel and a detailed look at its present.

How has your favorite team done against its old rival? You can check the game history between any two teams at the League Status Page [http://ss.cc.tut.fi/rec/riku/soccer_html/status/status.isr0.html].

And if you really think you know your Israeli soccer, then you can try your hand at the interactive Beitar Jerusalem Soccer Crossword Puzzle [http://members.aol.com/beitarjm/cross/cross.html]. Number 5 Across: Beitar's symbol is a six-letter word that begins with an "m" and ends with an "a." (Hint: you can see a huge one of these sitting outside the Knesset.)

Although Israel's national soccer team has had its share of bumps on the road to international success, help may be on the way. For the first time, two women's teams have made their debut in Israel with more teams planned [http://www.jpost.co.il/com/Archive/23.Jan.1998/Sports/Article-1.html].

World Cup 2002, here we come!

Punishment to fit the crime

By RACHEL TURKIENICZ

Included in this month's Torah portions is the chapter on Korach and his challenge of Moses' authority. Korach, a Levite, amasses 250 Israelites and confronts Moses, demanding to know why Moses feels he should lead Israel. Since God has selected the entire tribe of Levi, Korach believes he is a better leader. Moses' response is one of shock, as we are told he 'falls upon his face.'

Certainly for a man of Moses' humility, having to publicly defend himself and speak of his uniqueness would mortify him. The matter is resolved when God publicly selects both Moses and Aaron and punishes Korach and his followers.

The punishment is creatively appropriate to the crime. Korach challenges Moses through the spoken word and likewise speaks sufficiently ill of Moses to attract 250 followers. Korach uses his mouth to rebel against Moses and stands his ground. Therefore, God makes the ground open its mouth and swallow Korach into the depths of the earth. It is a beautiful display of measure for measure, yet the story raises serious questions.

Korach, for his own reasons, believes he is the rightful leader of Israel. Why is he punished for challenging Moses? Are we to believe that ambition is sinful? Is the Torah teaching that one must never question a leader or strive to replace an established authority? If this is the case, how do we reconcile our lengthy history of innovation and change through different leaders?

Some of our greatest Torah commentators, leaders in interpretation, disagree vehemently with each other over substantive Judaic points. Are these commentators wrong for expressing their opinions – have they sinned with their mouths? To understand the defining aspect of the Korach dispute, it is necessary to view a well-documented period recorded in the Talmud.

The Talmud chronicles lengthy disputes between two schools of thought: the House of Hillel and the House of Shammai. Each school of thought had a different approach to Jewish law and consequently different rulings governing behavior. Most often matters were decided according to the House of Hillel, yet the Talmud maintains that this does not negate the teachings of the House of Shammai. If both schools of thought are correct, however, why is the ruling following only the House of Hillel?

According to the Talmud, the House of Hillel merits this credit since they would always teach the interpretations of Shammai along with their own interpretations. Not only were the other interpretations taught, but the opinions of Shammai were presented first before those of their own school of thought. This consideration for the other interpretation signified the House of Hillel as the leader of its time.

The two scenarios of Korach and Hillel are significant. Korach challenged the authority through subversive means and the result could only be destructive. Hillel's followers respected the opposing opinion and used the opportunity of disagreement to enrich learning, and the results were truly rewarding.

Incident on subway prompts concern, anger

By SIDURA LUDWIG

Today I had a scary subway experience. A man and two young boys came and sat down around me, the man beside me, the boys in front. The boys, probably brothers, were about four and six years old; they had blond hair, blue eyes, small teeth and baseball caps.

They giggled and squirmed in their seats and the man talked tough to them. And the boys imitated him, trying out his words.

"I'm going to kick your butt," the 4-year-old said, rocking in his seat, his feet dangling above the floor.

"You think so?" the man asked. "You think you're tough?"

"Yeah," he said. "I'm going to kick your butt." His voice deceived him and he giggled again, his brother joining in.

Then the 4-year-old straightened his leg, and pointed his shoe, slowly, towards the man. It was hardly a kick, just a 4-year-old's leg in mid air, out straight, not long enough to touch the floor. The man grabbed his ankle and twisted it in his grip, so hard that the soft skin wrinkled beneath his fingers.

The boy winced, and the man said, "Yeah, that hurts, doesn't it? Don't let me see your foot again. Understand?"

I sat there with my mouth half open, my words at the edge of my teeth ready to march out of my mouth and unpeel his fingers from the ankle. The muscles in his hand tensed, and I thought about how easy it is for bones to crack. I sat there, my mouth half open, afraid that my words might make him grab my ankle instead, and I held back the words.

The man let go, and the boys squirmed some more and giggled some more. Then the 4-year-old reached for his brother's hat. The man leaped up and grabbed the boy's wrist, twisting it the same way, the boy pleading, "It hurts."

"Yeah, it hurts. You're making it hurt. You're twisting away. It's your own fault."

"Let go," I said quietly, but the man didn't turn his head. I have a quiet calm voice when I'm angry. And scared.

"Let go," I said again. "He understands. It's all right."

The man turned to me.

"Lady, you don't know. You don't have kids. You think he understands? He won't listen unless I grab him. That's how I was raised. I have permission from his mother. This is the only way he'll listen.

He still held on to the wrist, his muscles clamped tight enough to leave bruises.

"I'm just telling you to be careful," I said, looking at the boy, not the man. I have a cousin with eyes like that boy's – wide, jumping eyes that dance when he's excited and freeze when he's scared.

"I'm not doing anything," the man continued. "This is the only way they'll listen. You don't know what these kids are like, so don't go telling me what to do, because you don't know."

I think he let go of the wrist. I'm pretty sure that when my stop was next, he had let go. But when I left, he was telling the boys, "When we get you to school we're going to tell the teacher just how bad you were behaving on the subway. And we're going to call your mother. I'm tired of this, I'm tired of dealing with this all the time."

The incident raises a number of issues. It is an issue of child protection; those children are in the care of an abusive man. It is an issue of women's safety; I couldn't tear his hand away because I was afraid he would hurt me. It is an issue of responsibility; we are supposed to be concerned with bettering the world, yet no one else on the subway spoke up against the man.

It isn't right that all I felt I could do was tell him to stop, and even then, I hesitated. It isn't right that I left the subway and those boys are still going to be subjected to that man's abuse, that they remain left in his "care." It isn't right that while we shake our heads, criticizing other people's actions, we can't bring ourselves to do anything more than shake our heads.

I'm writing this article in the hope that my written words are louder than my voice in anger. I'm writing hoping that others will feel not fear, but rage, and that their rage will propel them to do more than shake their heads, maybe reach for that man's grip. I hope that their rage will give them the strength to unfold that man's fingers from the boy's wrist, one hand soothing the boy's bruises, the other holding back the man's hand.

Student impressed with Brandeis' Jewish focus

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Eliane Shore didn't want to like Brandeis University too much when she visited the Waltham, Mass., campus earlier this year. Considering its high tuition relative to Canadian universities, the Northern Secondary School student was wary of setting her heart on the school.

Intentions notwithstanding, she was very taken with the smaller (3,800-student) campus, where a chance cafeteria meeting led to an invitation to audit biochemistry and Italian classes.

Shore has been accepted at Brandeis, and is receiving the Phyllis and Moses Deitcher scholarship, a fund established there to assist Canadian students who have a strong academic background and an interest in the Jewish community.

Although Shore, 19, hopes to study medicine eventually, the Jewish focus at Brandeis – which has a respected science program but no medical school – was also important to her.

"My heritage is part of my everyday life," wrote Shore in her scholarship application. An alumna of secular private schools, Shore has been chanting Torah at Holy Blossom Temple on the High Holy Days for six years and teaches Grade 5 religious school on Sunday mornings. Last summer she was on a summer program in Israel, where she visited relatives of her father, Earl Shore.

Eliane credits her love of Judaism to Bracha Zalowicz, a teacher and Holocaust survivor who tutored her privately after she left Hebrew day school in Grade 2. "She was such a good storyteller that when she told me the Bible stories, I soaked it all up."

In Grade 5, Shore won first prize in the National Bible Contest as part of Holy Blossom Temple's Bible Contest team.

But it wasn't until two years later that she experienced her most defining moment as a Jew, as she wrote in her scholarship application.

When Shore asked her Grade 7 religion teacher for an alternate assignment because she felt uncomfortable studying the New Testament while preparing for her bat mitzvah, the teacher told her that if she was Jewish, she should go to a Jewish school.

Confused and shocked, Shore felt a religion teacher, of all people, should be more understanding. "How could she say something as racist as all Jews belong in one place?" she wondered.

Eliane Shore

"I realized how important it was for me to maintain my Jewish identity at all costs. This experience reinforced the message of my bat mitzvah Torah portion, the importance of teaching children the stories, lessons and history of the Jewish people."

The incident taught Shore an important lesson, said her mother Lesley. She stressed that the teacher's attitude did not reflect that of the school, which handled the situation "really well." The following year, Eliane received the school's religious education prize.

This summer, Shore will work in the same University of Toronto biochemistry lab where she spent three mornings a week as a co-op student this year, on U of T's mentorship program.

Her love of science is evident when she talks about cellular respiration and how the human body makes energy. "It's so interesting to think about all the hundreds and thousands of different processes going on even while I'm talking. It's so complicated and so interesting. When I totally 'get' it, I get so excited."

CLARIFICATION

Our June 25 story, "Former U of T paper pulled for anti-Jewish article," described an item in the New Edition that linked Jews to the pornography industry. The paper's former editor, Will Steeves, and its former distribution manager, Dan Gold, have no connection to the current management of the newspaper. According to the New Edition's masthead, the paper's editor now is Tom Conen and its distribution managers are "Jamie 'B' and bro."

Organizational changes to allow more diversity in Hillel programming

VANCOUVER — B'nai Brith Hillel Foundation has announced the new Jewish Students' Association/Hillel Student Board at the University of British Columbia for the 1998-1999 academic year.

"It's really an exciting time at Hillel," says new student president Nava Mizrahi. "The number of people who wanted to get involved with elections this year was very high, and that is representative of the direction Hillel has taken."

Mizrahi is taking over the presidency from Neri Moss. Moss remains on the student board as social co-chair.

The creation of new board positions and chairs will allow for much more diversity in Hillel programming. The aim is to enable students to get involved with any programs that are relevant to them.

New positions include a social action chair, a graduate and professional students chair, a cultural chair and a community liaison.

There are already 16 students on the student board.

Some highlights for the upcoming year will be a focus on student leadership development and building a strong Jewish community on the UBC campus.

The Vancouver B'nai Brith Hillel Foundation provides services and programming for Jewish university and college-aged students in the Lower Mainland of British Columbia.

'Subway car was filled, yet I was alone'

The subway car was filled with people, and yet I was alone, because no one else thought it was their business to speak up. Responsibility is not about leaving the repair up to some one else. It is about each of us doing all we can to ensure that this world is the safest, most beautiful place for us to raise our children.

The man was right. I don't have children of my own. But one day I will, and one day they might come into contact with him. That man might appear again one day, as a teacher, a neighbor, someone's parent, and I can't let myself accept that.

I walked out of the subway car today, but I cannot walk away. Those kids could have been mine, and I cannot accept a world where my children are left defenceless against that man. Those boys could have been mine, and no one else on that subway car got up to help them. Tomorrow, they will get back onto the subway with him, and he will grab at them at home, in the park, on the sidewalk. It's a cycle.

CJC delegation, Axworthy discuss war crimes, looted gold

OTTAWA — Concerns about increased anti-Semitism and racism in eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union, as well as the issue of war criminals, were the principal items on the agenda at a recent Parliament Hill meeting between Federal Minister of Foreign Affairs Lloyd Axworthy and the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC).

The CJC delegation, led by national president Moshe Ronen, also focused on matters related to international terrorism, the restitution of Jewish property in Europe, the Swiss banks and Nazi gold, Cuban Jewry and the proposed Holocaust Museum in Ottawa. Also at the meeting were CJC public policy and international affairs committee chair Les Scheininger, CJC national executive director and general counsel Jack Silverstone, CJC Ottawa advocacy director Eric Vernon, and Canada-Israel Committee executive director Rob Ritter.

Ronen noted that the Jewish community's sentiments toward Israel are unwavering. He said there is always a lot of interest in Canada's voting record at the United Nations. Axworthy responded that he has asked his department to develop a detailed analysis of Canada's recent voting patterns at the UN.

Ronen also stressed the centrality of Jerusalem to both Israel and the Diaspora. He asked the government of Canada to be more sensitive to this issue and for this to be considered in its pronouncements on the matter.

Axworthy elaborated upon different initiatives he has taken since visiting Israel last fall. As gavelholder for the Multilateral Working Group on Refugees, for example, Canada will be working toward facilitating family reunification and enhancing dialogue between Israelis and Palestinians.

CJC took the opportunity during the meeting to seek Axworthy's support as a member of cabinet for the proposed Holocaust Memorial Museum in Ottawa. "Canadian Jewish Congress intends to hold the Government of Canada to its commitment to establish a standalone Holocaust Museum in Ottawa. We appreciated Mr. Axworthy's sensitivity to this issue and his support for the concept," Ronen said.

Ronen raised the issue of pensions from Germany for Jews of German ancestry. Germany has struck special agreements with Israel and the United States to enable eligible Jews in those countries to collect pensions beyond the 1991 application deadline, but Canada has no such protocol. Axworthy undertook to investigate this.

CJC praised the cooperation of the Department of Foreign Affairs in the investigation into the possible role of the Bank of Canada in laundering looted Nazi gold. Scheininger then expressed his hope that Canada would join international pressure against Swiss banks to settle billions of dollars of claims stemming from their wartime actions. "The Americans have been proactive," Scheininger said. "We would want to see the same kind of reaction from the Canadian government."

CJC called for an audit of racist activities in eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union through Canadian embassies. Vernon cited the rise of extreme right-wing parties, such as the Truth and Life party in Hungary, which recently won 14 seats in elections. In the case of Romania, President Emil Constantinescu has publicly acknowledged his nation's guilt and responsibility for the massacres and the destruction of more than 300,000 Romanian Jews between 1941 and 1945.

However, a campaign still continues there to memorialize and rehabilitate wartime leader Ion Antonescu and some of his cabinet colleagues. Axworthy took note of these concerns and pledged to charge his ambassadors to report on such activities.

CJC praised Axworthy's leadership in promoting the establishment of an International Criminal Court to bring war criminals to justice. At the same time, Ronen noted the encouraging movement to take steps against suspected Nazi war criminals residing in Canada.

Ottawa JCC/Vaad Ha'Ir holds annual meeting

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — A large and supportive crowd attended recently when the Jewish Community Council of Ottawa/Vaad Ha'Ir held its 64th Annual Meeting.

In his annual report, executive director Mitchell Bellman told those assembled: "It is an exciting time to be a member of the Jewish community of Ottawa... We are three short months away from moving onto our new campus and what we hope will become the new centre of Jewish life in Ottawa.

"The Vaad Ha'Ir has a role to play in encouraging people to get involved in volunteer positions. We need to nurture participation, link up enthusiastic people with mentors and reach out to the unaffiliated in our community."

Three volunteers were honored at the meeting.

The recipient of the 1998 Freiman Family Young Leadership Award, presented to a member of the Ottawa Jewish community under the age of 40 who has made a significant contribution to the community, was Ottawa native, Charles Schachnow, 35. Following in the tradition of his parents, Shelley and Morris Schachnow, Charles has been involved in the community since childhood.

In introducing him, Schachnow's lifelong friend, Robert Greenberg, said, "In my opinion, the one trait that separates Charles from others is that he lives up to all his commitments...What you get is effort and results with a little laughter along the way."

The community's highest award, the Gilbert Greenberg Distinguished Service Award, was presented jointly to Thelma Steinman and Gerald Berger.

Octogenarian Steinman was recognized as a tireless worker who has been involved in almost every communal organization over the years.

"I suspect that she has been involved in community affairs longer than most people in this room have been alive, and that is a very humbling thought," said Roger Greenberg, who presented the award.

Lest anyone should think the award would be the culmination of her volunteer career, Steinman said in her acceptance remarks, "I fully intend to continue as always, for I am too young to retire."

Toronto native Gerald Berger, son of the late Salome and Louis Berger, also learned volunteerism at home. His parents were active in synagogue life, Hadassah-WIZO and United Jewish Appeal, and were among the founders of Toronto's Associated Hebrew Day School.

Arriving in Ottawa over 35 years ago to take up a position with the federal government, Gerald Berger became involved in the Jewish community. He is a past president of the Jewish Community Council of Ottawa/ Vaad Ha'Ir, of the Jewish Community Campus and of the Jewish Community Foundation, and has been active in the United Jewish Appeal, the United Way and the Canadian National Institute for the Blind.

"Gerry is a mensch. He is a warm, caring, honest person... I am proud to be a part of this ceremony where Gerry receives the award he deserves," said Norman Zagerman.

As Berger was unable to attend the award ceremony due to ill health, his wife Ruth accepted the award on her husband's behalf.

Since the bestowal of this award, Gerald Berger has passed away.

Elderhostel program in Montreal

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A group of older tourists from the United States and the rest of Canada holidayed at the Golden Age Association (GAA), spending a week learning about Montreal's Jewish community and its place in an evolving Quebec.

The 35 men and women were taking part in the first Jewish studies Elderhostel program in Canada. Elderhostel, a nonprofit organization founded in 1975, offers people over 50 the chance to travel and study all sorts of subjects at relatively low cost by keeping accommodation simple and forming alliances with educational and cultural institutions.

Last year, more than 300,000 people from North America participated in Elderhostel programs around the world, and 20,000 did so in Canada.

The group taking part in the inaugural program at the GAA had five days of classes at the GAA, putting in 4½ hours each day in the morning and evenings. Afternoons were free. They slept in the nearby dormitory of the University of Montreal, ate their meals in the GAA's kosher cafeteria and were transported by the GAA school bus.

The courses were entitled Quebec History and the Jewish Community, The Diversities of Jewish Life in Montreal, and Yiddish Humor and Folklore. Participants were given an overview of the role of the Catholic Church, the rise of nationalism and the Jewish influence on Quebec society.

"We covered everything from the emancipation of the Jews in 1832, which allowed them to sit in the legislative assembly, the school question, the anti-Semitism in the '20s and '30s, to separatism and the language debate, right up to Matzahgate and the Berson monument sign," said Pearl Grubert, chair of GAA's programming.

A retired schoolteacher, she led the classes, along with Jack Jedwab, Canadian Jewish Congress' Quebec director, lawyer Yoine Goldstein, Rabbi Howard Joseph, Daniel Amar, director of community services at FEDERATION CJA, and social worker Myra Giberovitch. A tour of Jewish heritage sites was included in the curriculum.

The Yiddish program was led by Janie Respitz, a young woman who surprised many with her fluency and knowledge of the language and culture. A performance by the Yiddish Theatre of the musical On 2nd Avenue was an optional excursion.

Volunteers also played a large role, from helping to serve meals to being on hand at the dorm.

About two-thirds of the groups were Americans, and at least five were not Jewish among the 35. They ranged in age from mid-50s to about 85.

Winnipeg shul to relocate

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Rosh Pina Congregation, north Winnipeg's largest synagogue, is looking to relocate in the southern part of the city.

The executive and board of the synagogue laid out its plans to sell and move south to the membership at the recent annual general meeting, which was attended by over 150 congregants. A letter had gone out to every synagogue member informing them of the decision.

The plan has been in the works for two years, reports third-generation member Israel Ludwig. He chaired the synagogue's future planning committee that recommended the plan of action.

The synagogue has been losing members and money for some years now. Ludwig reports that the synagogue has been losing about $100,000 a year. A campaign for funds last fall raised about $200,000 but that proved to be just a stopgap measure.

A divisive fight five years ago over egalitarianism cost the synagogue some long standing members, he says. As well, the neighborhood has changed and younger Jewish Winnipeggers are continuing for the most part to settle in south Winnipeg rather than in the more traditional north end. Membership used to be around 1,000. Now it is less than 700.

Chairman of the board Dr. Stephen Feldgaier reports that the board is currently in the process of developing an implementation plan. In the coming months, a number of committees will be appointed with representatives from the synagogue membership and possibly the community at large.

The board decision, which was unanimous except for one abstention, included authorization to put the current building up for sale. Feldgaier indicates that such action will be undertaken at the appropriate time, following recommendations that will be considered and adopted as part of the implementation plan. Realistic forecasts of the time frame between now and when the synagogue hopes to move into a new facility in the south end range from three to five years, he says.

David Bloomfield, president of the Beth Israel Synagogue, another north end shul, sees the problems that have plagued the Rosh Pina as something the remaining north end synagogues have to deal with. (There are currently just three synagogues in south Winnipeg, including the Shaarey Zedek Congregation, the city's largest.)

CJA chair wants women to become more active

By PETER CAULFIELD
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — It's time more women played active roles in the general campaign for the Greater Vancouver Combined Jewish Appeal, said Sondra Ritter, the recently named chair of the 1998-99 campaign.

"The women's division has always run smoothly," said Ritter. "There are many talented women with valuable campaign experience who can bring a lot to the table in the general campaign."

Ritter is hopeful she will chair a successful campaign. "We need to do well," she said. "The Lower Mainland Jewish community is now the third largest and the fastest growing Jewish community in Canada. There are Jewish people arriving here almost every day from other parts of Canada and all over the world. The community has many new needs, and we have to be creative if we're going to solve them."

One solution, Ritter suggested, might be to amalgamate some services in order to avoid unnecessary duplication. "I don't think amalgamation of Jewish education, for example, would be successful," she explained, "but it would be worth exploring in the case of services for seniors. The Wheels to Kosher Meals program for senior citizens is a good example of interagency cooperation that works."

Ritter said she hopes to see more Jewish community agencies and outlying communities becoming involved in the next campaign. "The arithmetic is simple," she said. "The more manpower you have, the more money you raise. And the more money you raise, the more everyone receives."

Ritter would also like to see a streamlined organizational structure. "I'd like to recruit a greater number of people in the campaign cabinet than in the past, and give each of them fewer responsibilities," she explained. "In that way we'll get more done, and it will take less time to do it."

Ritter, 52, is the mother of Paul, 28, and Romy, 24. She and her sister Janice own and operate Sonjan Enterprises Ltd., a property management and development company with holdings in Vancouver and in the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan.

The daughter of Arthur and Ancie Fouks, Ritter comes from a family of community volunteers. Her father helped put together the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver, a project which came to fruition in 1986.

Fouks, who sits on the board of governors of the University of British Columbia, also chaired two CJA campaigns.

Ritter comes to her new position with a wealth of experience as a volunteer in both the Jewish and non-Jewish communities. She served as president of Camp Hatikvah for three years, she is a life member and past chapter president of Hadassah-WIZO, and she served as a board member of the British Columbia Parkinson's Disease Association.

She said she agreed to chair this year's campaign because she felt a responsibility to Israel and to the Lower Mainland Jewish community.

"When I was in Israel last year, I visited some places in the northern part of the country that had received and benefited from monies raised by the campaign here," she said. "When you see your dollars in action and doing good, it really makes an impact on you."

Talks over by July 29: PM

By HERB KEINON
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Negotiations with the Palestinians over the second withdrawal will be concluded by July 29, when the Knesset recesses for the summer, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said on Sunday.

"I think this issue will be concluded by then," he told Israel Radio, adding, "I can't say for sure, because I can't tell the Palestinians what to do. If they don't give suitable answers, they will determine the fate of the process."

Netanyahu said it is the issue of reciprocity, and not the depth of the next withdrawal, that is holding up the peace process.

"There are still gaps in negotiations over the second withdrawal," Netanyahu said. " But we are not dealing with that. Now we are trying to arrive at a solution on issues of reciprocity. We are not willing to accept an agreement that is not an agreement."

Meanwhile, at a ceremony in Jerusalem marking the arrival of Spanish Prime Minister Jose Maria Aznar, Netanyahu said that once the negotiations with the Palestinians are concluded, he would like to see an international conference convened to deal with wider, regional issues.

In raising this controversial issue in the presence of Aznar, Netanyahu stressed that such a conference would not be a substitute for direct, bilateral talks with the Palestinians.

"After we finish [the negotiations]," Netanyahu said, "I would be happy if an additional international conference for regional issues would convene. This is not a substitute, and does not replace bilateral negotiations that must be held directly between the sides."

Netanyahu added that he would be very happy if such a conference were held in Madrid, as was a 1991 Mideast peace conference.

Aznar was receptive to the idea.

"If, at a certain time, there is a need for Madrid to serve as the venue for a peace conference, rest assured that we will be willing to make this possible," Aznar said.

Netanyahu also urged Spain to help break the deadlock in negotiations with the Palestinians.

"Spain has excellent relations with the Palestinians and the Arab world," Netanyahu said, "and if Spain uses its influence, if you, sir, use your influence, I hope one more push will get the wagon out of the mud in which it is stuck, and lead us toward a peace with security and reciprocity."

Netanyahu's clarification of his proposal for another regional conference came after a day of searing criticism of the idea from everyone from Labor Party leader Ehud Barak to MK Yossi Beilin and Education Minister Yitzhak Levy.

"It's another hot-air balloon intended to divert public opinion from the crucial issues, the failure to advance the peace process and implement the pullout," Barak said.

Beilin told Israel Radio that the proposal for an international conference, like the referendum idea of last week that has currently been put on hold, is just an attempt to stall.

And even Levy said it was not clear to him what the purpose of an international conference would be.

Barak's draft bill postponed

By LIAT COLLINS and MICHAL YUDELMAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Left-wing MKs strongly criticized the decision by Knesset Speaker Dan Tichon last Sunday to postpone by a week the preliminary reading of Labor party leader Ehud Barak's bill on drafting yeshivah students.

"The attempt to postpone my bill is a political manoeuvre and is unworthy of the Knesset," Barak said.

Tichon dismissed Barak's objection as "nonsense," saying, "Barak is a new MK and doesn't know the rules. All I'm doing is postponing the bill by one week."

This is the first private member's bill Barak has submitted.

Labor party leadership said Tichon's decision was made to enable Netanyahu to sabotage the support Barak's bill has with the public and in the Knesset.

Tichon based his decision on Knesset House Rules' clauses that if a bill fails, "basically similar or identical bills" cannot be raised for six months, excluding Knesset recesses. Tichon said Barak's bill is similar to a bill by Meretz MK Ran Cohen, which failed on Dec. 3, 1997. Therefore Barak's bill cannot be heard before July 8, which is six months plus the spring recess period.

Barak said his proposal had been introduced and approved 45 days ago, after the Knesset's legal adviser ruled it was not similar to Cohen's bill.

Knesset legal adviser Zvi Inbar said that if a bill is fundamentally different from previous ones addressing the same issue, it is permissible to present it to the Knesset less than half a year after the rejection of a bill on the issue.

Inbar said the bills by Barak and Cohen are not the same except that both relate to the principle of restricting the number of yeshivah students who receive a draft deferment. Cohen's bill called for a quota of 250 draft deferments a year, whereas Barak's speaks of 700. Barak's bill would, unlike Cohen's, enable those who get a deferment past age 25 to be completely exempt from military service. It also would allow students to work part time in certain fields, such as teaching or research, to support themselves.

Cohen said his bill was also scheduled to be raised again this week, not next week, "and there is no reason it should not. We're talking about a pretext and being unnecessarily strict with the House Rules and it proves the Haredim have taken control of the Knesset, the prime minister and the Likud, and all of them are helping 30,000 yeshivah students to dodge the draft."

Tichon said that "Inbar's recommendations are not binding on me. He is only the legal adviser." This is the second time in a week that Tichon has overruled Inbar's opinion.

Tichon rejected charges he was acting on political motives.

Nazis looted billions

In New Jersey, a state senate panel was expected this week to approve a measure to divest holdings in Swiss banks. The bill, which has been passed by the state assembly, would require state pension funds to withdraw deposits and investments from Swiss banks and to sell 280,000 shares in Union Bank of Switzerland.

New Jersey's vote is expected only days before state and local finance officials are to meet in New York to consider sanctions against the banks, in an effort to compel the banks to reach a settlement with survivors and Jewish organizations over charges that the banks hoarded war-era Jewish assets.

The three major Swiss commercial banks have offered $600 million to settle Holocaust-era claims, plus the amounts located in the forensic audit being conducted under the leadership of former Federal Reserve head Paul Volcker.

That offer was rejected as "humiliating," and Jewish negotiators reportedly asked for $1.5 billion.

Reform blasts conversion bill

By TOM TUGEND
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ANAHEIM — America's Reform rabbis have lashed out at controversial conversion legislation in Israel, warning that its passage "would devastate the Israeli-Diaspora relationship and cause severe and deleterious consequences in the political, philanthropic and religious realms."

The bill, now pending in the Knesset, would codify the Orthodox establishment's control over conversions performed in Israel and "create two classes of Jews," said a resolution adopted unanimously by the Central Conference of American Rabbis (CCAR).

The Reform rabbis also called on all Jewish federations, synagogues, communal organizations, and the Conservative and Reconstructionist movements to join in appeals to the Israeli government and Knesset to kill the legislation.

The appeal for an all-out effort against the bill was echoed by Rabbi Eric Yoffie, president of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, which represents 1.5 million Reform synagogue members in the United States.

Speaking by telephone from Israel, he warned that the Israeli government was working hard to neutralize opposition among American Jewish leaders.

Rabbi Charles Kroloff, vice-president of the CCAR, urged in an interview that a portion of the funds raised in the United States for Israel go directly toward building Reform synagogues and ordaining Reform rabbis in Israel.

But Rabbi Richard Levy, the CCAR president, sought to defuse a potential conflict with Jewish federations. He said in an interview that financial support for the Reform movement should not be at the expense of federation fund-raising campaigns.

However, Rabbi Paul Menitoff, the CCAR's executive vice-president, warned that the anger among Reform Jews ran so deep that they may not accept Levy's exhortation.

The emotional intensity generated by the conversion resolution stood in contrast to the generally low-key tone of the three-day meeting, which drew 500 Reform rabbis, about one-fourth of them women.

A potentially explosive issue – whether rabbis should officiate or sanctify "commitment" ceremonies or other rites for same-sex couples – was skirted by a prearranged decision to avoid floor discussion and a vote for at least two years.

The delay was criticized by some at the conference. A petition circulated among the CCAR's 1,700 members before and during the convention, stating, "We have officiated, or are willing to officiate, at a ceremony affirming the union of a same-gender Jewish couple," was signed by 530 rabbis.

There was a lively discussion on one committee report setting guidelines for handling charges of sexual misconduct against rabbis. In no-nonsense tones, the report set standards of near-puritan severity.

"Unacceptable behavior," the report stated in part, includes "an unwelcome verbal, physical or visual conduct of a sexual nature."

During the floor debate, one delegate asked for a definition of "visual conduct of a sexual nature," and the chair said "leering" might fall into that category.

Swiss-Jewish talks near collapse

By DANIEL KURTZMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — Talks between Jewish and Swiss negotiators all but collapsed last week, leaving only the dimmest prospects of settling Holocaust-era claims anytime soon.

Discussions at the U.S. State Department failed to yield progress, with Swiss banks again saying their best offer was $600 million, and the World Jewish Congress (WJC) and lawyers for Holocaust survivors again rejecting that amount as insulting.

"We are left with little hope for a settlement before July 1," said Elan Steinberg, executive director of the WJC, last week. He was referring to a date set by U.S. public finance officers to review the negotiations and possibly impose sanctions on Swiss banks.

"The negotiations by the banks are a sham," a source familiar with the talks said, adding that no further meetings were scheduled.

The secretive talks, brokered during the last three months by Stuart Eizenstat, U.S. undersecretary of state for economic affairs, soured recently amid detailed public disclosures about the negotiations.

The WJC last week slammed the banks – Union Bank of Switzerland, Swiss Bank Corp. and Credit Suisse – for going public with their $600 million offer despite confidentiality agreements signed by both sides. The package includes about $70 million the banks have already paid into a Swiss fund set up last year to benefit Holocaust survivors.

The banks, for their part, said they would reject "unfounded and excessive" demands and accused Jewish negotiators of jeopardizing the process by disclosing previous details.

With no amicable resolution in sight, the next phase in prodding the banks to return Holocaust victims' assets is likely to involve punitive measures taken by elected officials.

The meeting of state and local finance officers scheduled for July 1, was slated to discuss sanctions against the banks – a move the WJC has said it does not plan to oppose.

The finance officers agreed to a moratorium on sanctions in March, pending the outcome of settlement talks.

At the same time, Sen. Alfonse D'Amato (R-N.Y.) said the Senate Banking Committee that he chairs plans to reopen a 50-year-old accord signed with Switzerland on the return of Nazi-looted gold. Switzerland agreed to return $58 million to the Allies in the 1946 Washington Accord despite records that showed Switzerland accepted about five times that amount in looted gold.

British Jewry in decline

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — Britain appears to be facing its own Jewish continuity crisis.

A new demographic study shows that Britain's Jewish population has dropped to less than 300,000 for the first time this century, and if current trends continue, the number of Jews is expected to fall to less than 200,000 within the next 25 years.

The study, conducted by the Board of Deputies of British Jews, the community's umbrella organization, is slated for publication this month.

It shows there are now some 285,000 Jews in Britain, down from 308,000 a decade ago.

The largest erosion is caused by assimilation, with Jewish couples recording lower birth rates and the level of intermarriage now estimated to be running at some 44 percent.

Emigration to Israel accounts for the loss of some 800 a year, while an equal number of British Jews are believed to be emigrating to the United States each year.

June 22

• Police said they had collected enough evidence to arrest 10 employees of the pirate radio station, Arutz-7, according to the daily Ha'aretz. After the outcry that followed the raid on the station's offices last week, officials began to examine how the station could be legalized.

June 23

• Police launched an investigation into remarks by Arab Knesset member, Salakh Salim, that he was surprised the Palestinians don't kill more land dealers who sell property to Jews. Salim made the remarks during a tour of Jerusalem's Old City by members of the Knesset Interior Committee.

June 24

• The launch of a satellite designed at the Technion in Haifa was delayed by two weeks to further inspect the launcher rocket. The satellite was scheduled to be launched yesterday from a Russian military facility in Kazakhstan.

June 25

• Israeli soldiers, Amit Asoulin, 21, and Or Cohen, 19, were killed in the security zone in southern Lebanon.

June 26

• The final airlift of Jews from Ethiopia, a group of 58 Falash Mura, arrived last night in Israel. Absorption officials said the few dozen remaining Falash Mura in Ethiopia, would "trickle into Israel over the coming weeks."

50 Years Ago

LONDON, June 11 — Declaring that this is "a thoroughly bad time" to press for British recognition of Israel, Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs Christopher Mayhew today pleaded with the House of Commons to permit the status quo in Palestine during the truce period.

Replying to a bitter attack on the Palestine Policy of Foreign Secretary Ernest Bevin by Harold Lever, Laborite M.P., Mayhew asserted that recognition of Israel at present would be an act of political intervention which would favor one side and be wholly inconsistent with the spirit of the truce. He said that such a move could prejudice eventual mediation of the Arab-Jewish war.

Iran, U.S. ties improving

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

When Iran met the United States in the preliminary round of the World Cup in France last month, it was not just another soccer game, but one more milestone in an incremental process that may yet lead to a historic rapprochement between the estranged nations.

Since last December, when Iran's newly elected president, Mohammed Khatami, called for a "thoughtful dialogue" with the American people, the two sides have taken a series of significant steps to ease the tension and pave the way for a possible resumption of diplomatic relations.

Washington severed ties with Iran, a former ally, after militants seized the U.S. embassy in Tehran and held 52 hostages for 444 days. The seizure occurred shortly after the 1979 Islamic revolution, which resulted in the overthrow of the pro-Western Pahlavi monarchy.

As the years passed, the bitterness grew. Washington's tilt toward Bagdad during the 1980-88 Iran-Iraq War, the Iran-contra scandal notwithstanding, caused enormous resentment in Tehran. Similarly, the United States was extremely displeased with Iran's foreign policy: its sponsorship of radical groups in the Middle East, its opposition to Israel's existence, its denunciation of the Oslo peace talks, and its determination to acquire weapons of mass destruction and the long-range missiles to deliver them.

In 1993, the United States formulated a policy of "dual containment" to isolate both Iran and Iraq. Three years later, Congress passed the Iran-Libya Sanctions Act, designed to punish foreign companies trading with either one of those countries.

It seemed as if Washington's rift with Iran was immutable. But with Khatami's accession to power in August 1997, the political logjam was essentially broken. Following his call for a re-establishment of dialogue, he proposed non-governmental exchanges – mainly cultural and academic – with the United States. But in a nod to his more conservative rivals, who oppose better relations with the United States, Khatami listed a long litany of grievances against Washington, attacked the U.S.'s military presence in the Persian Gulf and declared his fealty "to our revolutionary principles."

Despite Khatami's disclaimers, doubtless voiced to pacify Iran's adamantly anti-American spiritual leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, the Clinton administration has responded to his overtures.

President Bill Clinton has said that he "would like nothing better than to have a dialogue with Iran." He has also expressed an interest in a "genuine reconciliation." For her part, Secretary of State Madeleine Albright has urged Tehran to join the United States in drawing a "road map leading to normal relations."

Meanwhile, there have been a number of telling developments suggesting that a thaw is indeed underway. In an echo of the "ping pong" diplomacy that preceded Richard Nixon's visit to China in 1972, American and Iranian wrestling squads have visited each other.

As well, Washington has toned down its official warning against Americans travelling to Iran and waived sanctions against French, Russian and Malaysian companies doing business in Iran.

(Recently, Clinton vetoed a congressional bill imposing sanctions on foreign,particularly Russian, firms that provide missile technology to Iran. Clinton squelched the bill because he is reluctant to antagonize Moscow, not because he has changed his mind about missile proliferation.)

Washington believes that Khatami – who recently told PLO leader Yasser Arafat that he would not oppose a Mideast settlement acceptable to the Palestinians – is a rising force of moderation in Tehran and should be supported.

Full normalization, however, is still far off. The American economic embargo directed at Iran remains in place. Washington is still opposed to the building of a pipeline through Iran to transport Caspian Sea oil to Western markets. The U.S. State Department, in its latest assessment of international terrorism, brands Iran as one of its few remaining "active state" sponsors.

Afula attack thwarted

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Security forces have arrested members of a Hamas cell who allegedly were planning to bomb Afula, the IDF said Sunday.

Five men from the Samarian village of Mirka were remanded until the end of legal proceedings against them by the Dotan Military Court last week.

The General Security Service, assisted by the IDF and police, detained the men after two bombs were detonated close to IDF patrols on the route linking Jenin and Nablus on May 9 and May 12, the IDF spokesperson said.

During interrogation, the men admitted to using home-made guns to carry out shooting attacks over the past year against Israeli vehicles in the vicinity of the Dotan army base. They also revealed the whereabouts of four home-made weapons and ammunition, as well as components they planned to use to prepare bombs. They also admitted setting fire to a forest near the Dotan army base in September 1996.

This is where we built cities for Raamses, suffered slavery and prospered from time to time as distinguished scholars, doctors, merchants or even as the current (Shomer Shabbat) U.S. Ambassador to Egypt.

Petra — Like our forefathers, we leave Egypt through the Red Sea to Aqaba. Visit Petra, the fascinating Nabatean city carved into red rock and hidden deep in the desert.

Djibouti — The land of the Afars and Issas and the largest refueling port on the Red Sea has a mix of African, Arab and French cultures, an exotic market and good duty-free shopping.

Mombasa — Gateway to Kenya has been a trading centre for centuries - Persians, Turks, Indians, Portuguese and Jews have all left their mark. Ancient forts, museums and temples abound. Bargain for brightly coloured kangas and custom woodcarvings. Spend Shabbat in a lovely beach resort with candlelighting to herald sunset over the Indian Ocean.

Tsavo National Park — Set up your camera for crocodiles, elephants, baboons, antelope, giraffes, hippos and colourful butterflies within sight of Mt. Kilimanjaro. The terrain is dotted with baobab trees (some up to 1,000 years old) and red termite mounts (5 ft. tall).

Amboseli National Park — In the shadow of Mt. Kilimanjaro catch the most dramatic settings in the morning before the clouds set in. There is nothing as majestic as a parade of elephants emerging from dawn darkness, or the graceful flight of an impala fawn.

Throughout the journey we learn from our expert local guides and gain a Jewish perspective with the help of Rabbi Moshe Stern. We dine on fine Kosher cuisine and live in casual elegance while discovering intriguing and exotic countries and visiting Jewish communities living in strange lands.

This is the trip for creating memories even for travelers with full passports.

Ulpan helps prepare Minsk Jews for aliyah

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

The buildings all look the same in Minsk. People don't smile. And the birds don't sing.

There is an almost overwhelming sense of greyness, shabbiness, hopelessness. A feeling that the best leave for a brighter future.

I went to Minsk, a place I never expected to find myself, on the United Jewish Appeal Israel 50 Mission of Discovery. While the scant 33 hours we spent there rendered a thorough knowledge of the city unrealistic, it was enough to get its flavor, as well as to meet some of the Jewish community.

As well, Belarus is the only country of the former Soviet Union (FSU) to remain Communist. While this has the positive effect of keeping official anti-Semitism very low, it means that the entire population suffers from a stagnant economy, a political system they feel they can't trust and a general air of suspicion.

It is difficult to not share that suspicion. When you arrive at the very modern airport in Minsk, your passport and visa are checked by stern-faced military personnel.

All money must be declared – exactly. Demanding to go through my wallet and purse, the customs official discovered $20 in Canadian money I had forgotten about, roundly denounced me for my lackadaisical attitude and made me amend my declaration.

At our hotel, the Orbita, the major tourist hotel in Minsk, an expressionless, grim-faced concierge manned a desk on each floor. She didn't seem to do anything much, she never spoke, even to respond. She was just there – watching.

And while the Jewish population of Minsk insist that their life is pretty much the same as anyone else there, when our group was putting flowers on a marker to the 5,000 people murdered by the Nazis in 1942, someone from an apartment overlooking the memorial threw bottles at us.

Minsk was part of the Russian Pale of Settlement, a small town, built with wooden houses, some of which can still be seen along the streets. At the beginning of the 20th century, half the population was Jewish; by the beginning of World War II, one-third were Jewish.

There were 86 shuls in the city, many restricted to those in certain professions. After the October revolution, nearly all religious institutions were closed, and by the eve of World War II, only three synagogues remained. After the war there was one.

Now, there are two synagogues, the Main synagogue, and the Central synagogue, which is Lubavitch. There is very little contact between the two, except for the fact that Rabbi Jonathan Rothman, spiritual leader of the Main synagogue, a transplanted New Yorker/cum/Israeli, is also the community shochet.

We were welcomed enthusiastically by the Jewish community of Minsk, who gave us meals, kept the vodka flowing and looked for opportunities to talk to us.

We went to an ulpan, where people of all ages learned Hebrew in preparation for going to Israel, and to a youth club, where shy teenagers told us about coming together to be with other Jewish kids, learning about Jewish holidays and history, and dreaming about a future.

The Jewish Agency, supported by United Jewish Appeals all over the world, runs a great many programs for the Jews of Minsk and Belarus. There are educational classes, youth clubs, programs for the aged, assistance in aliyah all over the country, with the most activity in the major cities.

Na'ale 16 takes youngsters in the first years of secondary school to Israel to finish their high school education, the idea being that they will decide to remain there and encourage their parents to join them.

Elderly have a hard life

The Jewish Agency helps the families remain in contact by periodic telephone calls and by allowing a yearly visit, either by the parents going to Israel, or by the child returning to Minsk.

There are many elderly leading very difficult lives. Many are alone, either because their families have emigrated or because of the tremendous loss of life during World War II.

The Jewish Agency provides social clubs and drop-in centres, as well as meals on wheels, which functions much as it does here, where the person delivering the food also makes sure that the client is doing well.

Clients can also get medical care and housekeeping help. Special packages are available, either by pickup or delivery, on Jewish holidays. On Pesach, for instance, the package would include matzah, oil, sugar and grape juice.

There is a tug-of-war between two philosophies of help for the Jews of Minsk, as for all the Jews of the FSU. Should they be encouraged to go to Israel? Or should emphasis be placed on bettering their lives there? Organizations such as Lubavitch, Aish HaTorah and Hashomer Hatzair are struggling to foster Jewish identity and Jewish life there. The Jewish Agency is doing that as well, but also assists people to get to Israel.

That assistance may include teaching potential olim Hebrew, helping prepare belongings for transport, even help in settling in Israel.

If all that is wanted is a plane ticket, then that is available as well.

The question of Who is a Jew is a major concern in Minsk, again as in the whole FSU. For most purposes, the Law of Return is the guide; that is, any one who has a Jewish grandparent is entitled to go to Israel and to get all the services provided by the Jewish Agency.

Naturally, this does not address the halachic difficulties, and is one of the reasons everyone gives a different number for the population of Minsk and Belarus. It appears that a large proportion of the Jewish population does not fulfil the halachic requirement of matrilineal descent. Intermarriage is more the norm than the exception, and many Jews don't even know, or particularly care, that they are Jewish.

A Yom Ha'atzmaut program at the State Russian Theatre, once the biggest shul in Minsk, featured a number of children in choirs and dance sequences, who had prepared for the program at Jewish schools and clubs. Estimates of how many really were Jewish ranged from 20 percent to 40 percent.

Alla Levine, a Minsk native who took the mission around the city, noted that for many years, the only thing the Jews had was a memorial to the victims of a Nazi massacre at Yama.

"Twice a year, on March 2 [the anniversary of the massacre] and May 9 [victory day], all the Jews came here, to pay honor. But they also came to see and speak to each other, and discuss their problems.

"This was their synagogue, their school, their club – it was twice sacred, twice holy, twice dear."

For years, she said, there were no Jewish activities, schools, theatres. "Children were ashamed if their parents spoke Yiddish," she said.

"We didn't even realize what was happening. It is not our fault – it is our tragedy."

The most poignant moment of the trip to Minsk was a visit to Rakovskaja Street. Originally a street full of Jewish life, with many shuls, it became the entrance to the ghetto in Nazi times. Now, the street is devoid of Jewishness.

Except for one house. A hollowed out place on the doorpost gives mute testimony that it was once a Jewish home.

An emotional Levine, gently touching the place where the mezuzah had been, recited the first words of a poem:

"The only house/In the only street,/The only witness/It's too much for it to bear."

Chai-Tikvah supports those with mental disorders

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Among the Toronto Jewish community's better kept secrets is the Chai-Tikvah Foundation, which has been providing support for consumers of mental health services for 15 years.

Founded in 1983 under the umbrella of Reena, which works to integrate the developmentally disabled into mainstream society, the Chai-Tikvah Foundation seeks to make life easier for those with mental disorders, running the gamut from schizophrenia, bipolar disorder (manic depression), anorexia and others.

And it's all done in a Jewish environment.

For the first time, the organization is reaching out to the community at large for financial help in order to provide more services needed due to increased demand.

Chai-Tikvah was founded by a group of parents whose adult children had nowhere to turn in the community for support and services. As with Reena, a prime mover behind the group was Rabbi Joseph Kelman, who attempted to remove the stigma of mental illness by noting that even King Saul suffered from depression and a mental breakdown.

Chai-Tikvah broke free from Reena in 1987 to provide housing, programs and ongoing support services to Jewish sufferers of mental disorders. Today, it works closely with Jewish Family & Child Service, from which it often receives referrals.

The organization receives 100 percent of its funding from Ontario's health ministry. Several requests for funds to the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto have been turned down, notes Chai-Tikvah's longtime executive director, Rochelle Goldman-Brown.

Goldman-Brown points out that over the past few years, there has been a shift in the delivery of mental health services and support, to more community-based programs. Chai-Tikvah's philosophy is in keeping with that, she says.

The foundation operates a fully kosher group home in the Bathurst-Steeles area for eight residents who receive round-the-clock care. Residents, who pay rent, cook their own meals, clean up and run errands – all with a view toward reaching independence. Jewish holidays are observed.

Four years ago, Chai-Tikvah expanded its mandate to include home visits and crisis support to those who live on their own or with their parents. Ten clients receive those services, which include the teaching of basic life skills.

Over the years, the foundation has "graduated" about 50 clients.

Goldman-Brown explains that for many sufferers of mental illness, loneliness is a big problem. To that end, the organization runs Club Simcha, which meets at the group home and provides a chance for clients to socialize.

Because demand for its services is so high, (there's an unofficial waiting list of about 75) a venue is needed for a drop-in centre. The foundation has also applied for a municipal grant to run a new weekly social program, Tea at Two.

Chai-Tikvah also needs additional money to fund programs for older adults with mental health needs. Reena too is planning a home just for older adults to serve an aging population.

Dr. Ira Kirshen, a dentist, chairs the foundation's eight-member board. There are four full-time staff members. For more information, call 905-886-6520.

New heart procedure employed in Israel

By JUDY SIEGEL
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — A 76-year-old man whose heart was so obstructed by swollen muscle tissue that he was unable to walk two steps, will now be mobile, thanks to a new procedure involving the injection of alcohol into the heart via a catheter.

He was the first patient in Israel to undergo the one-hour procedure, which was developed by Dr. Antonio Colombo of Milan.

The treatment was performed at Jerusalem's Shaare Zedek Hospital and beamed by cable to the Holiday Inn Crowne Plaza where hundreds of participants at the hospital's Third International Symposium on Cardiology and Cardio-thoracic Surgery were watching. Among them was Dr. Bernard Goldman, head of cardiac surgery at Toronto's Sunnybrook Health Science Centre, who chaired two sessions.

The patient, whose in-hospital recovery will take just four days, has suffered from symptoms of hypertrophic obstructive cardiomyopathy for years.

Caused by a genetic defect, it is often the reason for sudden death in young athletes unaware of the condition.

In this elderly patient's case, said Dr. Yaron Almagor, head of the hospital's catheterization unit, it was kept under control by drugs, but they finally lost their efficacy, and he was confined to a wheelchair.

"The genetic defect caused an obstruction of the part of the left ventricle leading to the aorta, because the muscle tissue swelled," Almagor explained. This condition causes fainting, dizziness, pain and even sudden death due to irregular heartbeat.

The alcohol kills the swollen cells, leaving room for blood in the left ventricle to pass freely into the aorta and the rest of the body.

Other demonstrations performed in front of the cameras at the symposium included the replacement of a defective mitral valve using robotic arms and minimal incisions into the heart; and a by-pass operation that does not require a heart-lung machine.

MR. PRESIDENT

Toronto endodontist Dr. Wayne Pulver was recently elected president of the Ontario Dental Association (ODA). A leader in many dental organizations during his 25-year career, Pulver said the ODA must address the needs of those unable to receive oral health care. The ODA is a voluntary organization that supports its 5,000 members in providing oral health services to the public.

ECRUSY alumni to hold reunion

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Does the acronym ECRUSY ring a bell? Alumni of the Eastern Canadian Region of United Synagogue Youth are invited to the organization's first major reunion, to be held this fall.

Alyssa Zobary (née Maskowitz) had a yen to reconnect with the Conservative movement's youth organization when she moved back to Toronto last August after seven years in New York.

"I realized USY was such an important part of my childhood and teens. I can see now, re-meeting people as adults, that it's also shaped their lives in terms of their careers and the types of people they became."

Zobary, 36, an alumna of Beth Tikvah Synagogue's USY, is a former adult education and women's centre director at Brooklyn's Sephardic Community Centre. Her brother Marty Maskowitz, also an ex-USYer, is the centre's executive director.

"A lot [of alumni] became social workers or are working for UJA," said Zobary, whose USY memories include letter writing campaigns on behalf of Soviet Refuseniks and annual phone calls to Anatoly Scharansky.

"It gave people a sense of pride in being Jewish and working in Jewish fields," she said. "It taught us to take care of other people, to see beyond ourselves and to do for [our] community."

Now Zobary, a mother of two, is focusing on plans for the Saturday night reunion, to be held Oct. 10 at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue. The event, which will begin with a havdalah service, will include "music, munchies and memorabilia," according to a news release.

Zobary and her committee don't know when ECRUSY was established, but she figures it's close to 40 years ago. The international organization dates back to 1951.

Reunion organizers have been in contact with alumni going back to the 1960s, and are looking for memorabilia – things like yearbooks, photos, buttons, T-shirts and convention banners – to display at the reunion.

ECRUSY, with over 300 members in 10 chapters, encompasses a geographical area that includes Montreal, Ottawa, Toronto, Hamilton, St. Catharines, Kitchener-Waterloo and London.

Alumni can be found as far away as Israel and Hong Kong, said Zobary.

For further information or to offer memorabilia, check the Web site at [http://www.interactivepages. com/usyreunion.html] or call the United Synagogue office at 905-738-1717.

Reverence for 'Israel's First Lady of Song' still strong

By JANINE MULLER
Special to The CJN

JERUSALEM — "Please God, please preserve all these things for me, the honey and the sting, the sweetness and the bitterness. Do not uproot what has been planted; Do not forget the hope; Bring me back to the good land".

In 1981 when Naomi Shemer composed Al Kol Eile (For All These Things), I was 11 years old, and the song was introduced to me and to my classmates by our Hebrew teacher, a shaliach from Israel.

I was absolutely convinced at the time that Shemer was talking to me. True, it was not the first time that I had experienced her songs.

An integral part of the Yom Hazikaron service was the singing of The Two of us Are from the Same Village; and no Yom Ha'atzmaut was complete without the uplifting Tomorrow (Machar).

The life-affirming, faithful tone of Al Kol Eile, however, seemed to affect me more profoundly than any of her previous songs.

During those years,the Voice of Israel was, for me, not a radio station, but the voice of Naomi Shemer: soothing, hope-inspiring, resonating with love for the land and the people of Israel.

Modern, pop music in Israel? I had never heard of any pop singers. I thought, perhaps naively, that all Israelis were singing The Eucalyptus Grove and were dancing in the streets to Od Lo Ahavti Dai (Lots of Love).

Now that I live in Israel, I have learned that Israel 1998 has grown beyond the Shemer classics, so deeply-rooted in the soil and traditions of Israel. Today, there are new singers and groups who appeal more to the young. Yet reverence for Israel's First Lady of Music has not abated.

To mark Israel's 50th anniversary, the recent annual Israel Festival opened with a tribute to Shemer, winner of the Israel Prize in 1983 for Hebrew Song Writing, whose Jerusalem of Gold was recently voted the most popular song of Israel's 50 years.

The concert took place in the Hassenfeld Amphitheater, Sultan's Pool, with a breathtaking view of the Old City walls. It was the night following Yom Yerushalayim and I remember thinking how fitting it was to salute Israel's national songwriter, on this night in particular and in this setting, so close to the City of Gold.

The concert boasted an impressive cast of contemporary Israeli performers, including Mati Caspi, Riky Gal and Boaz Sharabi. Each participating artist was asked to contribute his or her favorite Naomi Shemer tune; many of the songs were newly arranged by music director Adi Rennert, especially for this occasion.

Naomi Shemer

I soon discovered the incredible diversity of Shemer's songs; her vast collection features a wide variety of children's songs, army tunes and love songs, songs expressing not only nationalistic fervor, but also conveying pain and joy of a very personal nature.

Unfortunately, I was not able to catch some of her more popular tunes (such as Loo Yehi, All We Pray For) due to the overpowering voice of a 50-something man sitting behind me, who seemed to be reliving his past by generously sharing his rendition of these melodies with the crowd.

Shemer appeared for the finale looking lovelier and more graceful than her familiar photo from years past. I was not disappointed. She was witty and vivacious, just as I imagined she should be, and her voice was warm as she expressed her gratitude to all those who organized the evening of tribute.

She played the song that she composed in honor of Israel's anniversary, simply entitled, Yovel (Jubilee).

"Those who have loved, have loved; Those who have hated, have hated; Thus, 50 years have passed for us. Yet perhaps from day to day, between the light and storm, Springs a new hope."

Forty years after she began writing music for the school children of Kineret near the Jordan Valley where she was born, Shemer has still not lost her unique capacity to capture the unspoken melody of this nation's soul, to give it wings and to let it soar.

Lost music found again

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Fringe Festival is noted for its off-the-wall plays, and few will be stranger than Toronto Cantor Ron Graner's performance about the lost music of Russian composer David Nowakowsky (1848-1921).

It will include Graner singing from the "coffin" of one of Nowakowsky's most bitter critics, another cantor who is partly responsible for suppressing Nowakowsky's music until the end of World War I.

The hour-long Musical Pawns tells the intriguing story of how the Bolsheviks and the Nazis kept Nowakowsky's works from the public, and how trunks of his manuscripts were spirited out of Russia by his daughter, buried in a French peasant's field during World War II and survived a flood in a dusty United States' archive.

Graner was a cantorial student in New York when he was introduced to Nowakowsy's music, and he has made reviving his work a life project. It draws on letters, pamphlets and poetry from such diverse sources as Catherine the Great, Joseph Kennedy, Jr., Richard Wagner, Chaim Nachman Bialik, Hannah Senesh, revolutionary George Herwegh and poet Norman Corwin.

Reviews of previous productions of Musical Pawns in Minneapolis and Ottawa have praised the music (of Nowakowsky and other composers) and Graner's singing as the centrepiece of the show.

As in the other places, Graner will be accompanied by a pianist, violinist and cellist. For the Fringe, he has recruited three stellar musicians to accompany him, Adolfe De Santis, piano; Lily Szeto, violinist; and Timon Sadukov, cellist.

Musical Pawns will be performed six times from Monday, July 6 to Sunday, July 12, at the Royal Conservatory of Music, 273 Bloor St. W., near the subway. The curtain will go up at different times. Tickets are $8. For information, 534-5919.

CELEBRATE CANADA DAY DOWNTOWN OR UPTOWN

Here are two suggestions if you wish to attend Canada Day celebrations, either downtown or uptown.

The Bloor JCC is planning Crossroads, an exciting line-up of entertainment for the Canada Day weekend that is part of the Spadina and Bloor Street Festival. The events take place on the street.

The performers include composer Milton Barnes, who performs his own music and talks about growing up on Spadina; Norman Perrin, Dorothy Lichtblau and Michael Wex, who tell stories about life in old Spadina; playwright Morris Jacobs, who performs his one-act play, Zimmerman's Neighbourhood about a dry-goods merchant on Spadina; actor Sylvia Lennick, who recalls the golden age of Jewish theatre on Spadina; and documentary filmmaker Karen Shopsowitz, who screens her film about Shopsy's, her family's famous delicatessen.

Hosted by raconteur-about-town Michael Wex, Crossroads features numerous other performers and guest artists. July 4, 8 p.m., and July 5, from 12 noon. 750 Spadina Ave. at Bloor Street. Admission free.

In uptown Toronto, recording artist Amy Sky and special guests Lennie Gallant and Bruce Guthro headline a free family concert as part of Canada Day celebrations on July 1, 7 to 10:30 p.m. at Mel Lastman Square, North York. Fireworks start at 10 p.m.

* * *

Jack Grunsky Concerts: Folk-singer/composer Jack Grunsky reportedly has a rare and wonderful gift of captivating both adults and children with his well-crafted and catchy songs. Jack and the Chigo Chigo Band are giving two shows on July 5 at 2 and 4 p.m. on the Living Earth Stage at Yonge and Lawrence. Free.

Grunsky is also slated to perform another free concert at the Mill Pond Park, Richmond Hill, July 23.

When he is not busy writing and recording new songs, Grunsky paints. He had two successful art gallery shows last year.

* * *

Composer Honored: Ben Steinberg, composer-in-residence at Temple Sinai, has been awarded the degree of doctor of humane letters (honoris causa) by Hebrew Union College, Jewish Institute of Religion, New York.

The seminary of the Reform movement honored Steinberg for his research on Jewish music and for his own compositions and the body of work. "His gift as composer places him among the truly creative spirits of the American synagogue," the seminary said in conferring the degree.

* * *

Literary Awards: Amos Oz and Dahlia Ravikovitch, two central Israeli authors whose writing has spanned the course of decades, have been granted the 1998 Israel Prize.

Oz was awarded the prize based on his novels that since the 1970s have become classics in Israeli literature, including Elsewhere, Perhaps, My Michael, Black Box and Don't Pronounce It Night. He has published 22 books, including two collections of political essays and commentaries.

Ravikovitch is one of Israel's most renowned and prolific poets, whose work appeals to many different segments of Israeli society. Despite her dark themes that often deal with pain and suffering, Ravikovitch brings original use of the Hebrew language to bear upon her work, which speaks directly and intimately to Israeli audiences.

* * *

Dorothy Parker Remembered: She was born prematurely on Aug. 22, 1893, and she would later say it was the last time she was early for anything. She was married in 1916 to Edwin Parker, and after their divorce a few years later, she quipped that she had married him only because he had a nice clean name. Despite her wishes for rain, she died on a sunny day – June 7, 1967.

Carol Lempert

Dorothy Rothschild Parker, whose father was Jewish, became one of the pre-eminent wits of the Algonquin Round Table, the famed New York literary circle. To celebrate Parker's acerbic humor and legendary life, actor Carol Lempert is staging a one-woman show, That Dorothy Parker..., as part of the Fringe of Toronto Festival.

Presented by The Me and Mr. Jones Theatre Company, That Dorothy Parker... is being performed at the Poor Alex Theatre, 296 Brunswick Ave., from July 3 to 12. $8. Call 534-5919 for times and reservations.

Ensemble depicts joys, sorrows of family life

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — All the joys and sorrows of Jewish family life inhabit a staged reading of There Comes a Time by Medina Theatre Ensemble.

The play, by Medina members Fran Elliot and Roselle Stone, features an alcoholic grandmother, who gets shunted aside at her grandson's bar mitzvah, a husband and wife who bicker endlessly, an aging bachelor who nurses a grudge against his brother, and a woman who pursues and captures the bachelor in a retirement home.

And, of course, as is traditional in Jewish theatre, there is a happy ending. The grandmother overcomes her "schnapps therapy."

The emotional peaks and valleys are well handled by director Reva Stern, former artistic director of the Leah Posluns Theatre.

The alcoholic grandmother who knits the play together is played with verve by Gloria Valentine. As the curmudgeon who won't forgive his brother, Morris Nusyna makes the most of his good lines.

The sold-out audience in the B'nai Brith building on Hove Street was on the same wave length as the characters.

Others in the cast were Mark Albert, Trudy Deacon, Beverly Brock, Mira Lyon-Wein, Edie Goldstein, Jeanette Palframan, Ruth Flicht, Oscar Goodman, Jean-Paul Michellepis and Jacqueline Leung.

Up coming

Titled, Theme; Content; Style., the exhibition is a mini-retrospective of his work from 1963 to the present, capturing three specific periods: New York, Japan and his "non-sighted period."

By appointment only. Groups will be accommodated. Satok School of the Arts, 446 Ontario St. (between Gerrard and Carlton streets). Call 967-0780.

TRAVEL TALK

BY BILL GLADSTONE

GOING, GOING, GONE... AT SOTHEBY'S OF LONDON

A young man walks into Sotheby's, the famous auction house on New Bond Street in Central London, and produces a six-inch terracotta figurine from his knapsack.

Dating from the second Assyrian dynasty of roughly 3,000 years ago, the piece may be quite valuable, and the man agrees to leave it overnight so that one of Sotheby's 250 experts may appraise it.

In other areas of the sprawling old building, appraisers are examining antique books, paintings, jewelry, silver and other items that people have brought in from the street. "People come in with absolutely everything," says Sotheby's spokesperson Emma Cunningham, as a man passes by with a rolled-up carpet under his arm to join a queue of two or three others also bearing carpets. "Some people drive up with large pieces of furniture in the car, and the experts go outside and have a look."

The central headquarters of the world's largest auction house is usually a busy place, with throngs of people coming through the doors daily to have their valuable heirlooms appraised, and, if they are worth above the minimum value of £200 ($440 Cdn), to consign them to one of Sotheby's famous auctions. Hundreds of others arrive to inspect rare treasures before an auction, then return to bid on them. Some 250 auctions are held here annually.

Cunningham likens the scenes that unfold daily in Sotheby's vestibules to "a sort of permanent Antiques Roadshow," in reference to the popular British television show on which antiques experts travel around Britain and the world, appraising unusual and frequently valuable items brought to them by hopeful members of the public. (Experts from Sotheby's appear often on the show.)

"People bring in old books, toys, teddy bears, photographs, crockery, silver, glass – everything you can think of," she says. "Often, they bring things and they don't know what they are, and we're able to tell them. Most of the items we see we don't end up selling, because they aren't sufficiently valuable or there isn't a market for them.

"People are often just as relieved to know that an old jug is worth only £10 instead of £10,000, because they don't have to have it insured."

Sotheby's has identified more than 70 collecting categories, and most of its experts are knowledgeable in several categories. By seeing such a vast quantity of material, they acquire a proficiency that surpasses that of most museum curators, Cunningham says.

"A curator might be in charge of a very static collection of 500 pieces, whereas our experts might see 500 pieces in a week."

When Sotheby's accepts an item for auction, much consideration is given to where and how to sell it. "We sell things wherever the market is strongest for them. For example, a piece of English silver that comes into our Toronto office would be sold in London, and a wonderful Ming vase would be sold in Hong Kong, the centre of the Chinese art market. We always try to get the best possible price for the buyer."

Sotheby's generally makes its profits by charging the buyer a fee above and beyond the hammer price at which an item is sold. The fee is 15 percent of the first £30,000 and 10 percent on the remainder.

The auction house was founded in 1744 by Samuel Baker, a London bookseller who arranged auctions of whole libraries. In 1955, the company set up a second headquarters in New York City, where another 250 sales are conducted annually. Some 50 sales annually are conducted in more than 100 other offices around the world, including Tel Aviv and Toronto.

London, the focus of a vast empire, became the auction centre of the world after tens of thousands of British subjects travelled to the four corners of the earth, then returned with valuable and exotic artifacts, Cunningham explains.

"Traditionally, there has been a minimum of restrictions on importing art and antiques, making London a trading centre for these items."

Yiddish poems featured

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Binem Hiller, a 90-year-old poet, and his wife, Hadassah Kestin, eloquently read their Yiddish poems in the Israeli film Too Early To Be Quiet, Too Late To Sing made in 1996.

Both Hiller and his wife have died since then, underlining the precarious state of Yiddish poetry as its practitioners die off.

Yakov Tzvi Shargel, another of the dozen poets who appeared in the film, also died recently, according to Toronto Yiddish poet Simcha Simchovitch, who introduced the film at the Art Gallery of Ontario sponsored by Friends of Yiddish and the Toronto Jewish Film Society.

Another poet, Ziane Telesin, suffering ill health, had his poems read by his wife and doughty fellow poet, Rachel Boimwol. Her own work is gritty but humorous too.

A gem of a scene involves two men attempting to sing the chalutz song, Zol Zein, in the storeroom of Peretz Publishers, the major printer in Israel of Yiddish works.

Elderly Yiddish poets in Israel feel they are not appreciated enough even though the Knesset passed a law last year giving full status as languages to Yiddish and Ladino, Simchovitch said.

Two reasons for this, he said, are that Histadrut cut its subsidy to the Yiddish quarterly, the Golden Chain, which has since suspended publication; and the $200,000 given this year by the Knesset for Yiddish and Ladino was spent all on Ladino.

Younger Yiddish poets, however, most of them from the former Soviet Union, are coming to prominence in Israel and North America, including Boris Sandler, recently appointed editor-in-chief of the Yiddish newspaper, the Forward, in New York.

Amsterdam museum sets Jewish history in Dutch context

By RONA ARATO
Special to The CJN

AMSTERDAM — On a recent visit to Amsterdam, I was delighted to discover the Jewish Historical Museum, a unique gallery located in the heart of the former Jewish quarter.

The museum, which opened at its present location in 1987, is a fascinating time capsule, a blend of old and new where you quite literally walk through the history of Dutch Jewry.

To create the museum, the architects painstakingly restored four 17th and 18th century Ashkenazi synagogues – the Great Synagogue, the Obbene Shul, the Dritt Shul and the New Synagogue – to their original style, then linked them together through a network of modern glass and steel connections. The result is a light, bright gallery with deep roots in the past.

The Shulgas, an alley that cut between the Great Synagogue and the Obbene Shul, has been transformed into a glass enclosed walkway. The atrium-style museum entry, winding staircases and bridges linking the synagogues are modern while the brick facades and interior woodwork have been left intact.

For example, in the New Synagogue, the vault, cupola and columns are original structures while the bridges, balustrades and galleries are modern. The Ark in the centre of the shul dates from 1791 and was brought in from the synagogue in Enkhuizen to replace the original Ark that was lost.

The Jewish Historical Museum is the culmination of a dream that began in 1923 when the city's Department of Arts opened a Jewish gallery in a single room on the top floor of the Amsterdam Historical Museum. At that time, 10 percent of the city's population was Jewish and the municipality wanted to commemorate the community with small exhibitions on Jewish themes.

Founding officials predicted the fledgling gallery would soon outgrow its cramped quarters. Their dreams, however, were shattered by the onset of World War II. Following the German invasion of the Netherlands, the gallery was closed and the collection transferred to the Stedelijk Museum. The Stedelijk's director valiantly tried to protect the Judaic artifacts in his care but was eventually forced to relinquish them to the Nazis who shipped them back to Germany. When the museum reopened in 1955, officials set about replacing the lost treasures through private and public donations.

The purpose of the museum is to set Jewish history, culture and religion within the context of Dutch cultural history. The Sephardi Jews, descended from those who fled Spain for Portugal, were the first to arrive towards the end of the 16th century. Dispossessed by the Inquisition, they thrived in the religious freedom of the Netherlands and slowly regained the religious practices they'd abandoned along the way. They were followed in 1630 by a wave of central and eastern European Jews seeking asylum from the Thirty Years' War.

Dutch Jews were granted full civil rights in 1796 and by the 1930s most were highly assimilated. Ironically, it was the Holocaust that reminded many of them of their religious and cultural heritage.

The Jewish Historical Museum provides an impressive setting for the richly woven tapestry of Dutch Judaism, past and present. The permanent collection offers fine examples of ceremonial objects, including 17th and 18th century megillot Esther, ketubot and Chanukah menorahs.

Paintings by Dutch artists include Jan Voerman's The Days of Mourning and Jewish Wedding by Jozef Israels. The paintings and displays are augmented by photographs depicting all aspects of Jewish life. In addition, the museum regularly mounts special exhibits showcasing the lives of Jews around the world.

After visiting the exhibits, or as a rest stop, check out the adjoining gift shop. It is a treasure trove of Judaic books and art.

The Jewish Historical Museum is located across the road from the Opera House and the Town Hall buildings of the Waterlooplein and opposite the 17th century Portuguese Synagogue. It's an easy walk from Dam Square in the centre of the city. To get there by tram, take the Number 9 or 14 and get off at Waterlooplein or catch the Circle Tram that stops at the museum. Entrance fees for adults are approximately $8; children $2 and seniors and students (with international students card) $4. The facility is open daily, except on Yom Kippur, from 11 a.m. to 5 p.m.

Correction

As a result of a typographical error in the article "Jewish quarter of Krakow experiencing revitalization" (CJN, June 25, page 39) Auschwitz was placed 600 kilometres west of Krakow instead of 60 km.

Business Profile

Designer specializes in high-end residences

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — To Brian Gluckstein, owner of Gluckstein Design Planning Inc., happiness is an empty space.

Gluckstein, 37, interior designer of the new One Eleven Avenue Road condominium, says he loves creating environments for his clients.

"I have a great time dealing with home owners, with the craftspeople and with everyone involved in the project. Designing a home is always exciting."

He started his business as a one-man operation about 15 years ago, shortly after graduating from Ryerson Polytechnical University's interior design program. Today, he has 21 employees who help him design high-end residential homes, sales centres and model suites in Canada, the United States, Europe and the Caribbean.

His work has included the renovation and refurbishment of the Harbour Shops Mall in Palm Beach, the Windsor Arms Condominiums and Hotel in Toronto, the refurbishment of the National Golf Club in Woodbridge and the interior design of the new club house for the Glen Abbey Golf Club. He is currently working on over 40 projects.

Gluckstein has won several awards from the Association of Interior Designers of Ontario and has been honored by the American National Sales and Marketing Awards and the Greater Toronto Area Home Builders.

"I think our success lies in the fact that we stress high-quality designs and personalized service. We stick with a project from beginning to end – from concept until the owners move in. We're there until the furniture is settled and the pictures are hung."

Interiors designers can deal directly with home owners, says Gluckstein. "Seventy percent of our business is comprised of private residents who are building or renovating a home. A client calls us and we put together a team that includes us, as well as architects, landscape architects and builders.

"We work closely with the architect in designing the home's space. We concentrate on details in rooms such as the bathroom and kitchen, design lighting and help select all the furnishings. If it is a condominium, the end-user selects the suite and we customize it."

Gluckstein, who grew up in the furniture business, says designing a home has always been his passion. "I love working closely with my clients to choose their furnishings. We shop for antique furniture and carpeting.Furniture is often designed in our office, and tendered out to craftspeople here and in the United States. Some projects take years, from the planning stage until we select the furnishings."

When furnishing a home, Gluckstein studies his clients lifestyles and tries to design their home to reflect that lifestyle. "I look at their age and their family situation. We have to be practical, so if there are young children, for example, we make sure the furniture can grow with them. I like to furnish a home with pieces that have longevity, pieces that carry through for many years.

"I just finished designing a model home in Belgium. I know that people everywhere have the same sort of needs. They need a home that suits their way of life. When working in different countries, however, I have to take the climate into consideration. I use consultants extensively, who advise me as to what type of materials work best in their climate. We do a lot of work in Florida, and we must be careful to use materials that wear well near the ocean.

"That forms a large part of an interior designer's education – what materials to use in certain places."

His latest project, The One Eleven Avenue Road condominium, is located just north of Bloor Street. The $45-million renovation includes stripping the 10-storey office building and transforming it into 50 residences ranging from 1,100 to 4,500 square feet. They will be priced from about $500,000 to more than $2 million.

"It is an exciting project for me because we are taking an existing building and rebuilding it. The ceilings are 10 to 12 feet high and the interior structure is solid. We've designed a two-storey penthouse, which will be added to the top. We expect that some clients will buy two condominiums, which will be made into one large one."

Until now, he says, people have not focused a lot of attention on luxury condominiums. "A lot of people, however, want luxury but they also want an easier lifestyle. They do not want to worry about responsibilities. Here, there will be a full staff to look after their home when they are travelling. As well, residents do not worry about landscaping or shovelling. All their needs are taken care of. They have the space of a home, without the worries."

As a member of a team that includes builders, architects and landscape architects, part of Gluckstein's work on the condominium involves designing the lobby, the hallways and the recreation facilities. The concept is to design public spaces that are consistent with a luxury hotel and private suites that have the scale and detail found in the finest homes.

He designed the two-storey lobby to be accented in mahogany and glass panels and to include one wall that is made out of limestone, one wall mirrored with brass rivets and one wall that is draped in velvet.On the third floor of the building, he has designed a lounge area that includes a wall of French doors that opens onto a large, furnished stone terrace.

"Our buyers are people who are looking for elegant living space in a downtown, yet not so busy location. We expect a cross-section of buyers from their mid-30s to their mid-70s. In my capacity, I am trying to design space that will reflect their active lifestyle."

United Restitution Organization helps survivors get compensation

By STACEY STEIN
Student Intern

TORONTO — Their organization is housed in a modest office in the Lipa Green building, but the work done by Dora Elzbet and Kurt Herzstein is anything but small in scope.

Elzbet and Herzstein are the two caseworkers for the United Restitution Organization's Toronto branch, which seeks monetary compensation for Holocaust survivors from the German government.

Over the years, the office staff has diminished and the facilities have not been updated, most easily evidenced by the absence of a computer. Meanwhile, the volume of people seeking compensation has increased.

"A lot of Holocaust survivors are aging, and they didn't make their claim for various reasons in the 40s and 50s, but now they want to make their claim," says Elzbet.

"Publicity of the Holocaust is very high," she says, citing the prevalence of the Holocaust in the newspaper and in books. "Before, people were guarded, but now they will talk about it because it's everywhere."

Herzstein adds that in the past, many survivors refused to accept money from the German government. "Initially, people didn't want to take what they called blood money," he says.

But as the survivors age, their desperation grows. In some cases they are destitute, and in most cases they are grasping for some way to come to terms with the horrors they endured, he says.

Herztein, who was born in Germany, fled to the Netherlands in 1938 at the age of 14, and left in 1941 with the help of the Dutch underground. He arrived in Canada in 1944.

Elzbet is the child of a Holocaust survivor. A Lithuania native, she moved to Canada in 1980.

The majority of the United Restitution's clients in Toronto are Russian. The two caseworkers' multilingualism is a tremendous asset.

Elzbet speaks Russian, Yiddish, Polish and Ukrainian, among other languages. Herzstein says he "only speaks English, French, German, Dutch and Spanish.

"Somebody who works in this office has to have some language skills," he says.

The organization's first office was established in Frankfurt, Germany, right after World War II.

"Historically, Frankfurt had one of the largest Jewish communities in Germany," says Herzstein. "It was a natural place to establish an office."

The first United Restitution office in Canada was established in Montreal in 1947 or 1948. This was followed by the opening of the Toronto office around 1952. There are also offices in New York, Tel Aviv, Munich, Berlin and Los Angeles.

"At one time there were offices all over the world," says Herzstein.

The Toronto office is independently run, and the space is rented from the Canadian Jewish Congress.

There used to be about 12 people working in the office, but staff has been reduced to "one and a half," according to Herzstein. He works three days a week while Elzbet works four.

Aside from dealing with a large volume of claims, Elzbet and Herzstein must also deal with old claims, and a community that is rapidly aging. Herzstein says that deadlines for claims against Germany usually expired in the 1960s.

"There was a window of about 15 to 20 years," says Herzstein. "Claims could be made against the government for people who lost property in Germany, people that lost their health, their family, their education. But there were deadlines."

He says that after that time, the German government no longer accepted claims.

The United Restitution deals with a limited amount of claims which are administered by the Claims Conference against Material Claims of Germany. This is an umbrella organization that grants and distributes a series of funds that are given by the German government.

Elzbet and Herzstein interview claimants to determine which type of claim they qualify for, if any. The claim is then submitted to the Claims Conference.

"Our office here has the highest success rate of any office for successful claims," says Herzstein.

Integral to the operation of the United Restitution is "an understanding of the community and the difficulties we face," Herzstein says.

One of these difficulties is the length of time it can take to resolve a case. Herzstein cites a case involving a man born in 1906, whose claim was made in July 1993 and wasn't approved until November 1997. The man was sent a cheque that was returned to the Claims Conference.

"Maybe he's no longer alive; the man was born in 1906," says Herzstein. He adds that no one has been able to find a telephone number for the claimant.

"The frustrating thing is when you see a man born in 1906 getting approval at the age of 91, and now they can't find him. It makes my blood boil."

Herzstein acknowledges that not all cases take that long to resolve. He recently had a case that was approved in about 15 months.

"The Claims Conference takes a very long time to approve and process claims," says Elzbet. "And they don't necessarily go by age. A claim of a person who is born at the beginning of the century will be finished almost at the end of the century."

Another problem, Herzstein says, is the difficulty of obtaining documents attesting to the credibility of the claim.

"It's a little bit better now because the archives in the Iron Curtain, whether it's Russia, Ukraine or Poland, are [slightly] more accessible than they were three or four years ago," says Herzstein.

But he points out that these archives are different and "it's at the Claims Conference's discretion to accept the credibility of a claim."

Another challenge is dealing with people who have endured unfathomable atrocities.

Herzstein recalls one case where they had to call security. "[The client] became physically abusive," says Herzstein. "But you cannot blame these people because of what they have all been through."

As Herzstein discusses the touchy nature of the work, he points to a box of tissues on his desk. "Clients don't always act very rational," he says, accounting for its presence in the room.

"There are people who don't tell the truth, and people who, because of the horrors they went through, do not remember all the details that are required," he says. "For the client, it's a very traumatic experience.

"We all carry a certain amount of luggage and we cope with our experiences in our own way. These people have to function in a society that isn't particularly interested in what happened to them 50 years ago."

Maccabi names fundraiser

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Maccabi Canada, which organizes Canadian-Jewish participation in the Maccabiah Games in Israel, always seemed to be strapped for cash.

In the final months leading up to the big event, you could depend on seeing a flurry of last-minute fundraising events to help pay for the high cost of sending 250 of the country's best Jewish athletes to Israel.

Often, such efforts, while successful in their own right, seemed to lack coordination. And in recent years, athletes themselves were being asked to help pay for their trips and be part of the fundraising.

With the recent appointment of 50-year-old Montrealer Martin Schwartz as national fundraising chair, however, the hope is that by the next time the Games come around – in 2001 – there will be plenty of cash.

Schwartz, the head of Dorel Industries, which manufactures ready-to-build furniture, took on the fundraising title under tragic circumstances, following the death of the previous national fundraising chair, Gordy Schwartz.

This will be done mainly by getting started early, in this case, three years before the next games begin.

The plans include the formation of teams of regional fundraising chairs, soliciting more corporate sponsorship, stepped-up public relations and the publication of brochures, in cooperation with the YM-YWHA Jewish Community Centre's public relations department, Schwartz said.

In an interview, he recalled that before the last games, the biggest fear was that there would not be enough money to take all the athletes along. Fundraising began late, and as things turned out, "we came out pretty close to budget."

Schwartz is now discovering that, beyond being an organization for Canadian-Jewish athletes, Maccabi Canada is a stepping stone for general involvement in the Jewish community and in Israel.

"If not for their participation, many of the athletes could not go to Israel. They come back with a feeling for the community, with a feeling to build their involvement. Now they're aged 16 to 20. In a few years they could be very active in the community."

Schwartz himself has been a visitor to Israel several times since 1993, sometimes as part of a community mission and last year at the Maccabiah itself. He has also served as a leader at the Shaare Zedek Congregation.

It was Schwartz, with his contacts at the Royal Bank of Canada, who got the bank to make a corporate donation to the Games and to lend use of their offices for a Maccabi Canada meeting with hockey legend Jean Beliveau, who attended the Games for the second time last year.

"I saw the excitement of the kids," Schwartz said, "and I saw [Maccabi Canada president] Roy [Salomon] working so very, very hard.

"It's why I'm involved,' he said. "We know the community will need as much support as possible to keep going forward."

NBA's 'wandering Jew' Schayes league's oldest starting centre

By HARLAN C. ABBEY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Danny Schayes humorously refers to himself as "the wandering Jew of the NBA."

The only Jewish player in the league since 1985, the son of Hall of Famer Adolph "Dolph" Schayes also might be called "the bionic centre" after moving into the Orlando Magic's starting lineup in mid-season at age 38.

"I could be the oldest starter in the league," he agreed in a recent interview. "For sure, I'm the oldest starting centre."

Schayes moved off the bench when Rony Seikaly was traded to the New Jersey Nets. The Magic had 18 wins and 23 losses with Seikaly starting, but went 19-14 with "golden oldie" Schayes starting.

"I'm an old model with low mileage," he said at the time.

Drafted by Utah in 1981, Schayes averaged over 10 points and nearly seven rebounds per game with Utah (1½ seasons), Denver (7½ years) and his first season with Milwaukee in 1990-91.

After that – as a backup with the Bucks, Lakers, Suns and Heat, and Orlando since '96 – the 6-foot-11, 276-pound veteran saw his playing time cut sharply.

But a devotion to physical conditioning kept him ready to contribute, such as in a 21-point, six-steal, 11-rebound effort against the New York Knicks on April 4, 1997.

Even before resuming his role as a starter earlier this season, Schayes had been given more to do than under previous coach Brian Hill.

"My role then," joked Schayes, "was 'Break glass in case of emergency.' As you get older, coaches think you can't play a lot of minutes and you get pigeon-holed into that role."

Although he remembers hitting the six-foot mark as a seventh grader, when his father coached the old Buffalo Braves, Schayes credits his older brother David, now a social worker in Syracuse, with helping him develop his basketball skills by allowing him to play with older boys.

"And of course, I was a ball-boy for the Braves and attended many basketball camps where my father was coaching" the two-time Maccabiah Games participant said.

In fact, he has not ruled out coaching in the future, saying he has been coaching "in my mind" as a way of keeping mentally alert while on the bench.

If he does become a coach, Schayes said, he would adopt "parts of a few" of the many coaches he's played for:

"I spent eight years with Doug Moe in Denver, a purist in the passing game. I liked his uptempo, movement, everyone involved style.

"Chuck Daly [the current Orlando coach] is a players coach, which means he puts his players in a position to make plays, rather than call out every play every time you come down the floor."

Looking to the post-season, Schayes said he'll try to beat his father in a game of HORSE, where a player must duplicate his opponent's shot, a tough task because of his father's deadly long-range shooting touch.

"I can take him in a one-on-one game," he laughed. "He doesn't get up and down the court too swiftly nowadays."

The Inside Back

Media weigh 'God beat'

As I was saying...

By RON CSILLAG

My head is still spinning from a jam-packed three-day conference last month in Ottawa on Faith and the Media, at which religious leaders roasted the national media for stereotyping, misreporting, under-covering or ignoring altogether faith issues, while news representatives went into their customary defensive crouch, muttering something about "shooting the messenger." But as with most issues of faith and spirituality, the conference raised more questions than it answered, both about religion and the nature of news coverage.

Listening to some of the presenters, one could be forgiven for coming to believe that religion is the single most important story out there for journalists. Religious leaders, academics and even some reporters made a convincing argument: the biggest stories of the day – abortion, homosexuality, the Middle East, Northern Ireland, immigration, even gambling and sentencing of criminals – have overriding ethical/moral/religious angles.

As well, delegates noted repeatedly, Canadians are hungry for spirituality (witness the stunning success of the Chicken Soup series of books, and of author Deepak Chopra), and are far more religious than the media believe. One poll released at the conference showed that six out of 10 Canadians say religion is an important part of their lives, while another revealed that 6.2 million people in this country attend religious services every week.

But the poll also showed that 65 percent of those who attend a house of worship weekly believe the media do a "poor" job of covering faith and religion.

So came the media bashing, some of it deserved.

Complaints came fast and furious, mostly from Muslims, that the media's portrayal of non-mainstream faiths is often dismissive, patronizing or presented as an afterthought, sandwiched between the Wheels and Travel sections. Coverage of mainline religions, the conference heard, suffers from benign neglect.

But here's an interesting nugget: Which faith groups get the most ink and airtime, according to a scan of 1,300 articles from 26 newspapers? Roman Catholicism is one (understandable, given that nearly half the population professing a faith is Catholic.) And which was second? Judaism, whose adherents amount to just 1.2 percent of believers. As author Lois Sweet, a one-time religion reporter for the Toronto Star put it, a visitor from outer space would conclude from media coverage that Canada's two biggest faith groups are Catholics and Jews.

The discussions did not extend to why that is so (the old newsroom saw that "Jews is News" did not come up), or whether the Jewish community, notoriously sensitive when it comes to the secular media, welcomes all that attention. The thrust of the conference was how to improve relations between what academic and journalist Peter Desbarats called the "rationalist" media and "fundamentalist" faith groups.

The standard media response was that the news business thrives on the negative; that journalists for the secular press must cater to a general market; and that the media, in their hallowed tradition of skepticism, must never be cheerleaders for anything.

On the other hand, veteran editors, with the notable exception of the Globe and Mail's William Thorsell, seemed to get the message: The media should cover faith issues more and better, simply because religion matters to Canadians. And faith leaders conceded that the media should continue to play the role of watchdog over powerful institutions like religions.

It was a healthy, exhilarating debate. And it accomplished other things, like baring the foibles of the often sanctimonious media, and showing that religion (and spirituality) are growth industries. It also showcased the inherent tensions of living in a largely secular society – a society shaped, ironically, by Judeo-Christian tenets on law, family structure, education and culture.

So don't be surprised if more media outlets make religion a "beat." The Ottawa Citizen has led the way in the field, abandoning its weekly religion page and incorporating coverage of religious issues throughout the news pages.

The "God beat," as one U.S. observer put it, must surely be as important as the stock market, Viagra, or Roger Clemens' arm.

About Seniors

Dear Jesse,

I find that my appointments with doctors are very frustrating. I never get the amount of time I need. After I leave, I don't always remember everything the doctor said to me because our visit was short. Do you have any suggestions?

CB

Dear CB,

Before you go to your appointment, prepare a list of questions you want to ask the doctor and take this list with you. At the appointment, you could then write down the answers or ask the doctor to write the information for you. Alternatively, you could ask someone to go with you to the doctor and help you get the information you need. You have a right to clear, understandable information from you doctor. If your doctor does not communicate with you in a way that is comfortable for you, then you may want to change doctors. It is very important that you feel that you are a partner in the management of your health care needs.

Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Jesse to The CJN. Jesse is the executive director of Jewish Support Services for the Elderly (JSSE) in Montreal.

(Last week's answers are on page 28.)

We are awaiting Prime Minister Netanyahu's response.

This letter was sent to Prime Minister Netanyahu by the Board of Directors of the New Israel Fund on June 22, 1998. We wish to share our reaction to the recent developments on religious pluralism and conversion with those members of the North American Jewish community, who are concerned about these issues.

For the latest information out of Israel regarding this issue, sign up for our Religious Freedom Bulletin by emailing us at Info@nif.org or call us at (416)781-4322.

Dear Mr. Prime Minister,

We applauded when you created the Ne'eman Commission to seek a compromise on conversion in Israel acceptable to all streams of Judaism.

Unfortunately, the compromise was stillborn, never even signed by its members. Now your government proposes to legislate the so-called Ne'eman recommendations--new institutes to train would-be converts with conversions performed by the Orthodox rabbinate only.

We deplore such legislation.

Why? The commission envisioned a compromise contingent upon four elements: conversion institutes staffed by rabbis from all denominations; approval of these institutes by Israel's religious establishment; conversion of candidates by the Orthodox rabbinate; and a two-year trial period during which to evaluate the process.

The Chief Rabbinate harshly rejected the institutes. So far, not a single Orthodox rabbi has agreed to serve in one. The only element of the plan the Rabbinate did accept was that conversion would remain under their control.

Under these circumstances, the Reform and Conservative movements have opposed your legislation.

Religious pluralism is not, however, just a Diaspora concern. A Gallup poll found that 42% of Israelis indeed want an Orthodox rabbi to officiate at their most important ceremonies. But 32% would prefer a Reform or Conservative rabbi!

We believe that in Israel, as everywhere else in the Jewish world, individuals wishing to marry, divorce, or to convert to Judaism deserve the right to do so under the auspices of whatever denomination they choose. Israel's denial of that right violates the "freedom of religion and conscience" guaranteed by its Declaration of Independence.

Mr. Prime Minister, we understand that you face many political pressures. However, we must advise you that in our judgment your proposed law will further alienate North American Jews and cast doubts on Israel's commitment to its own founding vision. It will deepen polarization within Israel. And it will make life all the more difficult for thousands of Israelis from the former Soviet Union who want to convert but are unwilling to promise that they will rigorously observe Orthodox practice.

We urge you to withdraw this destructive piece of legislation.

Respectfully,

The Board of Directors of the New Israel Fund

Compensation plan unveiled

Agreement assists some survivors for the first time

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — As many as 1,000 Holocaust survivors in Canada will receive compensation from Germany for the first time as a result of a landmark agreement.

The agreement signed last month between Germany and the New York-based Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany expands the eligibility criteria to two groups of survivors who until now have not received any compensation from the German government.

Some 7,500 survivors worldwide are expected to be affected. A spokesperson for the Toronto office of the United Restitution Organization (URO), which seeks compensation for survivors here, estimates the accord could affect up to 1,000 people in this country.

This week, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) president Moshe Ronen and executive director Jack Silverstone are in Jerusalem for the annual meeting of the Claims Conference, and it is expected they will lobby to make the new compensation package more liberal in its criteria.

Congress is hailing the agreement as an important step in the ongoing and emotionally charged issue of financially compensating Holocaust survivors with German money.

Payments resulting from the new agreement are expected to be made after Jan. 1, 1999. The package is geared toward two groups.

McDonough speaks with The CJN

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Alexa McDonough wears the mien of leader much better these days, given that in last year's federal election, she took her New Democrats from nine seats in the House of Commons, to a respectable 21, one more than the once-mighty Progressive Conservatives, but still well back of the Bloc Quebecois and the Official Opposition Reform party.

But the NDP did especially well in Atlantic Canada, carrying eight seats, six of those in Nova Scotia, where McDonough had led the provincial New Democrats for 15 years, sometimes as the sole NDP member in the House of Assembly.

McDonough, chosen federal NDP leader in 1995, is on something of a PR campaign

these days. She spoke to The CJN at length last week, after her publicists contacted the paper for an interview. Several wide-ranging issues were discussed, including those of interest to Canadian Jewry.

McDonough, 54, reserved her most pointed remarks for Canada's record on pursuing Nazi war criminals, calling efforts to date "weak-kneed...the antithesis of what should have been expected."

Without mentioning the name of one-time U.S. Nazi hunter Neal Sher, whom Canada has hired as a special advisor to its war crimes unit, McDonough said it is "humiliating to think that we have to have American neighbors come to Canada and say, 'Here's what needs to be done and here's how it can be done.'

"I think that disappoints and shocks Canadians, although it didn't totally shock [those] who read Irving Abella's account [in] None is Too Many, or other historical accounts of Canada's early response to refugees."

For McDonough, Canada's record on war criminals and other issues is part of what she sees is a downward slide the country has gone through in recent years on matters of international concern.

It's all part of "a disappointing picture people have with Canada. I think Canadians have a sense of lost stature and credibility and erosion of what was once a proud record of achievement and leadership on international issues."

'Canada has not distinguished itself on many foreign policy fronts'

Except for Canada's recent leadership role in getting most of the world to sign an accord banning the production and use of land mines, which she praises, McDonough seems to rue this country's presence on the world stage.

"Canada has not distinguished itself on many foreign policy fronts," including the Mideast peace process, she says. As vice-president of the Socialist International, McDonough comes into contact with many world leaders, whom she says speak of Canada's role in world affairs "in a kind of mournful way...[as] a celebration of the past, not the present."

One reason for that, she feels, is that Canada "has submerged [its] identity," and hitched its foreign policy wagon to that of the United States.

(At the most recent meeting of the Socialist International in Oslo, McDonough held talks with former Israeli Prime Minister Shimon Peres, for the second time.)

McDonough sidestepped The CJN's questions about B.C. New Democrat and party foreign affairs critic Svend Robinson, whose publicly stated positions on Palestinians and Israel have caused some concern in Jewish circles over the years.

Most recently, Robinson attended a pro-Palestinian rally in Ottawa, where he spoke out against "the injustice of Israel's continuing to confiscate occupied land, to build illegal settlements and to legalize torture of Palestinians."

Asked whether Robinson's views on Israel mirror those of the NDP, McDonough said her party, "in a very clear way," is "fiercely committed to ensuring that Canada plays a positive role in advancing the [Mideast] peace process. We don't want to veer away from that."

Other areas discussed included:

• the Liberals' main claim to fame, the balanced budget and the much-vaunted surplus – The NDP believes the surplus was created on the backs of provincial and municipal governments, and that Ottawa should "start repairing the damage it created" by using extra monies to pump up social and health care programs it had cut back.

• social programs and health care – McDonough and the NDP favor national standards. She points out that Ottawa has cut its funding of provincial health plans from 50 percent to 13 percent, which has damaged not only health care but the relationships between the provinces and Ottawa.

• the Calgary Declaration – It was passed by nine provincial governments and it recognized Quebec's "unique character." While McDonough calls it an "important gesture," it would be "a very big mistake to exaggerate it. Anyone who pretends it's a solution would set up the rest of Canada for the kind of ridicule that you would expect [Quebec's] Premier Lucien Bouchard to engage in. It's a gesture...an accord, not a legal document."

Alexa McDonough

• the Social Democratic Forum – The NDP will press on with on Canada's Future, established at the party's spring convention. It's a grassroots effort, in conjunction with other progressive forces, to get Canadians focussed on national unity and a vision for Canada.

McDonough predicts a decline in the popularity of the federal Liberals, whom she accuses of working hand-in-hand with the Reform party. She termed recent efforts by Reform and the Bloc Quebecois to see eye-to-eye "a bizarre tango" between two parties, both of which try to convince Canadians that federalism doesn't work.

UIA-CJF merger creates new organization

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In what must certainly be seen as a rarity in communal Jewish life in Canada, the number of Jewish organizations has dropped by one with the announcement last week of the merger of the United Israel Appeal (UIA) and the Council of Jewish Federations (CJF).

The new organization, supported by all 10 federated communities in Canada, is called UIA Federations Canada, said Steve Ain, its senior administrator. The group is up and running and held its first board meeting in Toronto recently.

The merger parallels a development in the United States where that country's United Jewish Appeal and the Council of Jewish Federations moved into the same Manhattan offices and agreed in principle to merge.

The Canadian consolidation has a number of benefits, said Ain and Harvey Wolfe, the organization's Montreal-based president. It should attract stronger leadership, blur the distinction between overseas and local needs and shift the discussion to "Jewish needs," enhance the efficient use of human resources, increase the involvement of lay leaders and give Canada greater influence at the Jewish Agency.

It will also clear up confusion in the various communities over where to obtain support for their campaigns or federation concerns, Wolfe said.

The move should also see a shift in influence domestically towards the larger federated communities, particularly Toronto and Montreal, when it comes to deciding how much money raised in annual campaigns goes to Israel (through the Jewish Agency) and how much remains for domestic needs, Ain suggested. That outcome will result from the new governance formula for UIA Federations Canada's board of directors which will see the 10 federated Canadian communities and unfederated communities receive representation on the new organization's board of directors based on size. Toronto and Montreal will each be entitled to four board members while London, the smallest federated community, will receive only one seat, he said.

Will likely operate by consensus

Wolfe suggested that despite that new formula, UIA Federations Canada will likely operate by consensus.

In the world of Jewish organizational life, there are numerous acronymed groups that perform functions that only flow chart devotees seem to understand. At the heart of the larger Jewish community is the federation which coordinates planning and budgeting issues, develops leadership and services a myriad of agencies providing services to the Jewish community. In Toronto it is known as the United Jewish Appeal (UJA) Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto. In Montreal, it's Federation CJA.

In addition to its administrative functions, each federation operates the community's annual fundraising effort. In Toronto, the UJA is the chief fundraising group.

The United Israel Appeal (UIA) of Canada is the conduit through which funds earmarked for use on the international Jewish scene are allocated. Most funds go to the Jewish Agency, which operates rescue and settlement programs for Jews making aliyah. The UIA had several other tasks, including operating fundraising campaigns in unfederated areas like southwestern Ontario and Saskatchewan. It also provides support for campaigns through speakers, materials and it organizes missions to Israel.

In Canada, the Council of Jewish Federations has a primary mission of strengthening local federations. "It acts as the collective voice for local federations and provides consulting services in planning, budgeting, personnel and leadership development. It also develops endowment funds," Ain said.

CJF also serves as a forum for the allocation of funds raised in local campaigns to national Jewish organizations like Canadian Jewish Congress and Jewish Immigrant Aid Services.

The amount each federation allocates to these groups is based on a formula but when it comes to Israel, "each federation negotiates with UIA Canada," Ain said.

With the new consolidated organization, "hopefully some kind of collective international response based on a formula will emerge," he said. "One of the things we're going to be able to adopt is the equivalent of a national collective responsibility."

Students write creatively

Each year the Board of Jewish Education (BJE) in Toronto sponsors a creative writing contest for elementary and middle school students in the day and congregational school system.

The contest this year was dedicated to Israel's 50th anniversary. More than 500 poems, stories and articles – a record number – were submitted.

We place a very high priority on encouraging our youngsters to think and to write creatively, especially in these times, when the subject is Israel.

For the past three years The CJN has published samplings of the contest's "winning" entries. We are pleased do so again this year. I regret that space permits us to reproduce so few submissions.

We commend all the students who took part in the contest.

Freedom

At last I see the soothing light
Of the magnificent glowing moon.
The freedom of the earth begins at sunrise.

The bird soars peacefully above the fluffy clouds.
The ant crawls out of his tunnel awaiting the day to come.

And I can wake up and roam free under the heat of the sun.

While the screams of the Holocaust still ring in our ears.

The Little Girl Who Came to The Kotel

Once there was a little girl who lived in Canada. The little girl's name was Nicole. Nicole always wanted to go to Israel for her bat mitzvah. One day Nicole did go to Israel with her mommy, daddy and both her sisters. Nicole wrote a letter to go into the Kotel and the letter said:

"I wish there was peace in the world and everyone would have food. And if it is OK, I would like to have a little puppy."

I Must Never Forget

I am joy, in pride I stand.
I never think of what is wrong.
We can live in our holy land and sing... no, shout its holy song.

Yet, now I wonder, wonder why
I celebrate with my joyful face,
Do I know who had to die,
So I could be in this very place?

Their names, their lives, hopes and dreams,
Whose loved ones just broke down and cried,
Whose voices are among the screams.
Who for their people, they all died.

Would I also boldly give my life?
Would everything I have, I'd give?
They went through this hellish strife,
So in our land, free I could live.

So now I stand. I pray for peace.
I still remember, amongst the cheers,
Those men who died had signed the deed,
That gave our land its fifty years.

Israel Through The Eyes Of An Oleh Chadash (excerpts)

One morning, when I was a girl of five
I awoke to receive quite a surprise
My parents announced with a great deal of glee
We're going to move to the Land of Milk and Honey!

Now, although I was still very young,
From the time I was a baby, of Israel we had sung.
I knew it was the land the Torah talked about
Where Jewish people had once lived, strong and proud...

As we drove to Jerusalem we passed rocks, trees and hills,
Strange looking cactus plants, even tanks in which Jews had been killed.
The sun, setting behind the mountains, cast its golden glow,
But the famous milk and honey, nowhere did it flow...

When we arrived at our destination, with no milk and honey in view,
I could no longer contain my curiosity, some explanation was due.
"Mom and Dad, please tell me, I have looked all around
For a land filled with milk and honey, but none can be found."

"No my dear child," my parents answered laughingly,
'Land of Milk and Honey' is an expression not be taken literally.
It means that God gave us a land with the potential for blessing and sweet life,
Where all can live in peace and an absence of strife.

But that is something that depends on our efforts and cooperation.
To build a land is no simple operation.
Now we are here perhaps we can be part of fulfilling God's blessing.
Come let us start.

Police investigating NOI leader

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Toronto police hate crimes unit is investigating a complaint that the leader of the Toronto branch of the Nation of Islam (NOI) promoted hatred in one of his speeches.

The investigation stems from a complaint launched by Canadian Jewish Congress, based on an address by NOI Toronto leader Don Muhammad to a recent meeting of 50 supporters.

In the meeting, which was closed to whites, Muhammad claimed Jews throughout history have financed wars and created enemies between countries to keep the wars going and enrich themselves, according to a report in NOW, a weekly news and entertainment publication.

Muhammad reportedly also told the meeting, held in the NOI's new mosque at Oakwood and Vaughan Streets in central Toronto, that the television show starring an openly gay Ellen DeGeneres represents part of the danger threatening to wipe out the black race in the next century.

In a subsequent interview with the Toronto Star, Muhammad denied the NOI is anti-Jewish, anti-gay or anti-white, but he stood by his statements about Jews financing international conflicts.

Congress' national president Moshe Ronen said the NOI message runs contrary to "the essence of Canadianism, the celebration of diversity and national harmony."

Ronen said he had requested leaders of the Roman Catholic, United and Anglican churches to "reject the anti-integrationist separatism which the NOI has embarked upon. This approach tears down bridges of understanding and tolerance that we together have so carefully built."

Doug Tindal, a spokesperson for the general synod of the Anglican Church of Canada, said "the church supports the efforts of any group to raise above its oppression. We encourage people to take a positive route and look at their own empowerment and not in the disempowerment of others."

Suzanne Scorsone, a spokesperson for the Catholic Archdiocese of Toronto, said "generally we don't comment on the statements made by other religious groups."

However, the "commitment of the archdiocese and the Roman Catholic Church as a whole is to tolerance... Relations with cultural groups and religious groups makes for a richness that is incomparable."

Organizations merge

Currently, federations allocate from 46 percent to 10 percent of their campaigns to international causes, Ain said.

Toronto is at the high end of foreign allocations with 46 percent while Montreal gives about 31 percent. With Toronto and Montreal getting greater influence on the new organization's board, which has inherited that allocation task, greater funds should be forthcoming for Israel, Ain said.

"We have a concern in the UIA that a lot of people are turning inward as they feel the needs overseas are over," Wolfe said. But Israel still receives 60,000 immigrants every year, he added.

Any new funding formula "is not going to change overnight," Ain said. Any increase in foreign allocations will have to be implemented over time and through an allocation formula.

Bloor JCC dedicates lobby

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Toronto Star columnist David Lewis Stein was honored with the Leonard Bernstein Controversy Award at a presentation at the Bloor Jewish Community Centre (JCC) recently.

Stein was presented with the award as part of a dedication ceremony in which the centre's reception area was renamed the Leonard Bernstein Lobby.

Bernstein was a long-standing member of the Bloor JCC who took an active role in the centre's chapel, and who enjoyed stimulating conversation on topics of the day, his brother Coleman said. The plaque that will be placed in the lobby quotes his late brother, saying: "It's the most wonderful place in the city."

Stein, a commentator on urban affairs, recalled Bernstein's devotion to the Bloor JCC and its unique atmosphere. "I'm doubly honored to get the award on the day he is being honored," he said.

Stein was introduced by CFRB commentator and former Toronto Sun columnist Christie Blatchford, the first recipient of the Controversy Award.

The dedication and presentation took place shortly after conclusion of Sunday morning services in the centre's chapel. Coleman Bernstein remembered his late brother as someone dedicated to the Bloor JCC's place of worship. "He made sure there was a minyan," as well as refreshments for the worshippers afterwards, Coleman said. Even when he wasn't feeling well, he made a point of picking up people to attend services, he added.

Bernstein's granddaughter, Tamara Burns, 13, said her grandfather "instilled the love of this institution in our family." A student at the Downtown Jewish Community School that is housed in the Bloor JCC, Burns said the centre is "a living example of the concept of an extended Jewish family."

With the dedication of the lobby, there are now two facilities in the Bloor JCC that bear the Bernstein name. The chapel is named for Michael Bernstein, Leonard and Coleman's brother who was killed in action during World War II. Michael enlisted at age 17 and saw service during D-Day. He was wounded in July 1944 but returned to action and was killed on Dec. 20, 1944 in fighting in Italy.

Panel examines delicate issue of interdating

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — As a Jewish campus professional, Pearl Gropper Berman walks a fine line between serving as a representative of the Jewish community and avoiding judgmentalism when talking to students involved in interfaith relationships.

In those situations, the recently named assistant executive director of Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto likes to ask, "Why be Jewish?" She has found a strong correlation between students' ability to answer that question and their understanding of interdating.

Gropper Berman, the former director of York University's Jewish Student Federation, was one of three panelists at a recent forum on interfaith relationships sponsored by the Hesed committee of Beth Tikvah Synagogue. Also speaking were Susan Jackson, director of continuity programming for UJA Federation, and Rachel Schlesinger, social worker and educator.

Ben Zion Shapiro, professor emeritus at the University of Toronto's Faculty of Social Work, moderated the evening.

"I can appreciate how difficult it may be for a student to talk to me," said Gropper Berman, "and I would not want to do anything that could potentially jeopardize our relationship."

She asks students who are interdating questions such as, "How is your Judaism going to be affected by this?" And she tries to have them think about what their life would be like without Judaism.

Students who interdate may feel animosity toward parents, said Gropper Berman. "They can't understand why their parents aren't happy for them. They feel they're not a priority. Their parents seem to be more focused on the issue than on their child."

Rabbi Wayne Allen, spiritual leader of Beth Tikvah, mentioned in a dvar Torah preceding the panel that the participants he met in an Introduction to Judaism class for potential converts included day school graduates who had fallen in love with someone non-Jewish and wanted to commit themselves to having a Jewish household.

Gropper Berman has met numerous students "who had extensive Jewish experiences, and for some reason, Judaism never spoke to them. [Parents] need to help them find the answers about what is positive," she advised.

The parents' role is to "give kids as many tools as they can," said Jackson. But keep in mind, she cautioned, that teenagers are "merely hormones with feet."

To help them realize some of the problems that can arise in interfaith relationships, she recommended the film When Love Meets Tradition, available through UJA Federation's media centre.

Parents give their children conflicting messages when they espouse liberalism but caution them about marrying outside the faith, said Schlesinger.

She stressed the importance of identity for children. "They need to know who they are. If a parent doesn't have a strong identity, it's impossible to give it to a child."

Her fear is that children "will be left without strong values, morals or supports of either group... I have seen a number coming for counselling who can't relate to a grandparent."

In a sense, every marriage is a mixed marriage, Schlesinger noted.

Couples who intermarry need to make decisions about what type of religious education to give their children and how to maintain a warm family relationship. "You have to negotiate and renegotiate. If there is a conversion, you have to have a strong motivation for it. That motivation will be felt throughout the family unit."

Although having a "shared religious core" is important, Schlesinger said, "research indicates that a strong family is going to be strong even if there are differences in religion, if other things are in place."

An interfaith relationship "forces us to think more clearly about our Jewishness, who we are and what we stand for," said Schlesinger. "The rest of us can go through life not thinking about it."

Bonds honors Canadian leaders

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — In celebration of Israel's 50th anniversary, State of Israel Bonds held a gala tribute dinner at the Sheraton Centre Toronto honoring seven outstanding Canadians .

The black-tie event, featuring Gregory Peck, attracted 1,450 sponsors. Former premier of Ontario William Davis was the master of ceremonies, and co-chairs were Susan Fenwick and Stanley Hartt.

Honorees were business executives and community leaders A. Ephraim Diamond, V. Maureen Kempston Darkes, Anthony Munk representing his father Peter Munk, Isadore Sharp, Bernard Sherman; Henry Jackman, former Ontario lieutenant governor and chancellor of University of Toronto (U of T); and Rose Wolfe, former chancellor of U of T.

Davis, who visited Israel on two occasions where he "gained a sense of what that country was all about," told the audience, "Tonight we are celebrating, not just the State of Israel's 50th anniversary, but the recognition that in that very volatile and difficult part of the world, Israel stands out as the true democracy.

Toronto MP Jim Peterson, in his greetings from the government of Canada, said that the story of the State of Israel is a story of courage.

"In 50 years, Israel has met and overcome the challenges of its creation and survival. In that time, the people of Israel have built a modern nation, a truly historical achievement on which we reflect with great pride."

Hartt said that in the past, Israel Bonds were marketed mainly for the Jewish community as a way to help Israel. Today, the bonds are treated as investments , he said.

He noted that these bonds carry an excellent rating – rated A minus by Standard and Poors and number one by the National Association of Insurance Commissioners in the United States, "which is the highest rating obtainable."

The proceeds from the evening, Hartt explained, are being used to purchase Israel Bonds in the names of local and Israel-based foundations selected by the honorees. He announced that for this Double Mitzvah program, "commitments raised in connection with this dinner honoring our seven worthy honorees has surpassed $15 million."

A specially prepared video featured the honorees, and focused on the infrastructure needs of Israel.

Peck, talking about his role as a Jew facing anti-Semitism in America in Gentleman's Agreement, said, "I hope people left [the theatre] with a change of attitude."

Peck visited Israel 10 times and once filmed there for three months. "I feel a tremendous affinity with Jews – I feel close to the Israeli people."

Non-Jewish students use drama, song to explore the Holocaust

By DANIEL WOLGELERENTER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A group of mostly non-Jewish students recently used drama and song to learn some lessons from the Holocaust.

Before an audience of parents and students, 120 grade 3, 4 and 6 students at Parkdale's Queen Victoria Public School performed excerpts from the Brundibar children's opera, composed in 1938 by Terezin inmate and Auschwitz victim Hans Krasa, and performed at Terezin after 1941 by 8 to 12 year-olds.

Queen Victoria, Ontario's largest elementary school with 967 students who speak over 50 languages, joined the United Synagogue Day School – which staged a similar performance May 26 – as one of two schools in arts educator Helena Fine's pilot Brundibar project.

Funded by the Ontario Arts Council and the private Delaney Foundation, Fine brought Brundibar to Queen Victoria at the urging of vice-principal Margie Marmor.

"For [Queen Victoria students], it was a real introduction to the history, to the Holocaust," Fine said. It also helped the mostly non-white students see that racism can happen to non-visible minorities as well, she added.

"I think they realized that it's not just skin color, it can be anything," Fine said.

Brundibar also exposed students to professional musicians, directors and set and costume designers who worked with them in smaller groups on various aspects of the opera, which consisted of a multi-media slide show and dramatic musical performance.

"For many of the kids, it was the first time ever they were involved with artists for staging and music," Fine said. "The kids were enthusiastic and they loved it...It's something meaningful in their lives. They'll remember it forever."

In all, students spent 16 hours over 3 weeks on the production.

The opera, which was performed about 55 times at Terezin, deals with themes of bullying and oppression through the eyes of children.

It tells the story of Aninka and Pepicek, two children who must sing for money to buy milk for their sick mother, but who are thwarted by a mean organ grinder named Brundibar who drowns out their songs.

Eventually, the children are joined by animals who hatch a plan to interrupt Brundibar with a lullaby sung with other town children. It earns the children milk money, which Brundibar steals.

In the end, the animals and children retrieve the money and turn Brundibar over to a police officer.

"The idea is that if we get everyone together, we can win... and in the end the evil is defeated," said Fine.

The computer slide show preceding the performance – prepared by students and teachers – explicitly linked the opera's themes with the Holocaust.

"One doesn't have to be Jewish to deal with issues of the Holocaust because the issues speak to all oppressed peoples," Marmor told teachers after the performance.

Participating Grade 4 teacher Sanjukta Roy estimated that 80 percent of her students have been in Canada for one year or less, and only "four or five" were born here.

Many arrived as refugees, like at least one Roma (Gypsy) child in the performance. One child said the performance reminded him of how his father was imprisoned in Vietnam.

"What happened here was that a safety net was created for the kids...and in that safety net they felt comfortable dealing with issues that take a long time to get at with children," said Marmor.

"Often, kids who have trouble with the academics can thrive through the arts...[it] gives them a chance to shine," Marmor said.

Grade 3 teacher Lynette Stejshak-Cohen added that "the children were able to understand the issues at a deeper level through drama" because they could act them out in a non-threatening environment.

The grades 3 and 4 students saw Brundibar performed professionally at the Beth Sholom last fall as part of ongoing Holocaust and anti-racist studies in the Queen Victoria curriculum.

Clein says goodbye to USDS

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — When Pauline Clein, principal of United Synagogue Day School (USDS) Bayview branch, began working at the school in 1971 there were only 75 students.

The school grew to more than 600 students under her leadership, an era which comes to an end in July when she retires.

Accolades for Clein flowed at a recent retirement party at the Bayview campus, attended by students and former students, school staff and former colleagues, members of the board of directors and parents.

The formal speeches by educators and the board, as well as informal comments made by parents and teachers, all echoed a common theme: Clein was described as an innovative and top-notch educator with a warm and caring disposition.

Board member Julia Spritzer, whose involvement with USDS Bayview dates back some 13 years, said that Clein "always had an open door. She's always addressed our needs."

At the same time, there's a "grandmotherly" quality about Clein, Spritzer said. "At recess, she stands by the door to make sure the kids are zipped up and their hats are on."

Grade 2 teacher Rivka Schechter, a teacher at the school for nine years, described Clein as a "forward looking" educator and a "very supportive" administrator who encouraged innovation in the classroom. "Pauline never got stale in her approach to education," she said.

Elie Newman, president of the USDS board of directors, said "there aren't enough words to describe my admiration for Pauline, for her commitment and dedication."

Clein said "It almost pays to retire to hear all this wonderful stuff."

She said the job of principal has been very fulfilling. "It's been rewarding to see the campus grow, and to have students who are returning as teachers or parents, as well taking their place as leaders in Israel."

Along with overseeing the increase in the number of students and the subsequent physical expansion of the building, Clein said, she played a key role in setting up the middle school.

She said she is particularly proud of introducing recorders to the school. The recorder group, which is made up of about 30 students, has become part of the school culture, she explained.

Clein said her educational initiatives include the integration of Judaic and general studies, the integration of computers into the curriculum and the development of Hebrew methodology.

She noted that the school now serves a wider spectrum of the population and that there are more support services available for students with special needs.

Clein's immediate plans include a three-month trip to Israel to visit her son and his family. She intends to return to the classroom while she's in Jerusalem, but not as a teacher.

"I'd like to study for myself," she said. "I want to do some text study...Torah study is ongoing and continuous. It's a life-long occupation."

Unwelcome doctrines

Since the middle of this century Canada has increasingly defined itself by an abiding emphasis on communal inclusiveness and inter-ethnic tolerance, by religious pluralism and multicultural accommodation. Indeed, so highly valued was that emphasis, it became enshrined in 1981 in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms of the then newly repatriated, amended constitution of our country, to ensure that it characterizes our society for all time.

Section 27 states: "This Charter shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with the preservation and enhancement of the multicultural heritage of Canadians." (our emphasis)

Multiculturalism is now part of the very essence of our way of life, adding strength, sinew, resilience and profound meaning to Canadian society. But more than this, the laws that embody our values and protect our society must be interpreted in a manner which enhances this evolving, uniquely Canadian ethos of multiculturalism.

Into our multicultural community, the Nation of Islam (NOI) has formally arrived. Last month, the first Canadian mosque of the NOI opened in mid-town Toronto. Judging by the first media accounts, the NOI program is alarming and quite antithetical to the Canadian ethos.

Relying on published statements and paraphrasals of public statements made in NOW magazine by Don Mohammed, minister of the Toronto mosque of the NOI, the Globe and Mail last week reported that Mohammed had once again raised many of the old, malicious, Jewish conspiracy canards; had tried once again to cast doubt on the historicity of the Holocaust; had reiterated his xenophobic and homophobic messages; and was trying to foment fear and resentment among a new, potentially burgeoning, local following.

In swift response to the report of Mohammed's preaching, the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) asked the Toronto police to investigate. That investigation is currently underway. Alongside the complaint to the police, Congress has also appealed to the leaders of Canadian faith communities to rebuke and renounce these odious pronouncements.

In a letter to the leaders of the Canadian Christian establishment, Moshe Ronen, CJC national president, wrote: "Those who are the moral and religious leaders of our country must speak out forcefully for tolerance and disavow [such] statements that are harmful to racial or religious minorities. We hope that your faith community will reject the anti-integrationist separatism which the NOI has embarked on. This approach tears down bridges of understanding and tolerance that we together have so carefully built."

Summing up the situation, Keith Landy, CJC Ontario chair, put the issue plainly and boldly: "Spouting hatred of others is unacceptable. We won't tolerate it as a community and we don't believe Canadians should tolerate it."

We commend the CJC for its swift response. And we agree with Landy. The brand of expression practised by the NOI should not be tolerated by ordinary Canadians. Nor do we believe that it is tolerated by the majority of Canadians. Its vile, exclusionary, anti-Semitic message, cannot and should not, in the words of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, be "demonstrably justified in our free and democratic society," in our constantly evolving, uniquely Canadian, multicultural ethos.

A new house of prayer in the midst of any community in this country is surely to be welcomed. But a house of such divisive, hateful, anti-Semitic impiety is not. In view of the fact that the police are investigating the purported NOI teachings, there may be a question of the legality of those teachings. They are antithetical to our values. They harm rather than enhance multicultural accommodation and understanding in our society. We therefore add our voice to that of the CJC and plead with the leaders of the Christian and the Muslim community in Canada to publicly defend our Canadian values by denouncing the unwelcome doctrines of the NOI.

Yiddish still lives in these schools

In his article "Yiddish in Canada" (CJN, June 18), Prof. Leo Davids states that in "other than the ultra-Orthodox population...and among Jews who are now in their 70s and 80s, the language has been given up."

Yiddish is a living, vibrant subject at Jewish People's Schools and Peretz Schools and Bialik High School (JPPS/Bialik).

Every child from Grade 1 through Secondary V studies Yiddish language and literature and many of them actively participate in Montreal's Yiddish theatre troupe. Yiddish is required for a student to receive a Bialik High School diploma. Our graduates have won Rhodes Scholarships and have professorships for their work in Yiddish. The childrens' love of Yiddish is reflected in their enthusiasm and participation and in their use of the language.

Our school system and its students, founded by Labor Zionists 85 years ago, represents the entire spectrum of the Jewish community.

Opposes bid to extend Jerusalem's boundaries

We are troubled by the current efforts of the Netanyahu government to extend Jerusalem's boundaries to the east via an "umbrella municipality." Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu can act as offended as he wishes at the reaction to this move throughout the world, but there can be little doubt that this initiative is essentially annexation by stealth.

Whether it be by land expropriation, housing demolitions, new Jewish settlements, or other means, Netanyahu and Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert are continually trying to up the ante on Jerusalem in ways that preclude finding an honorable solution.

Within the framework of an undivided city there are indeed ways to accommodate reasonable expressions of Palestinian nationalism. But as long as Netanyahu continues with his unilateral efforts to completely separate the Arab parts of Jerusalem from the West Bank there will only be trouble. Shalom Achshav and others in Israel will continue to resist all measures contrary to the spirit of Oslo whether they be Israeli or Palestinian actions.

Seeks truth behind Oslo declaration

Sheldon Kirshner, in his review of Uri Savir's book The Process (CJN, June 11), writes "Savir, a fluent writer." This fluency seems to apply to his Hebrew writing only. The book was translated to English by Amos Carmel.

In the June 10 issue of Ha'aretz, Yoel Singer reviewed the book. Singer was, at the time, a legal advisor to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and was part of the Oslo process. His first involvement was an assignment from Shimon Peres to review the draft of the Declaration of Principles.

This is what Yoel Singer writes: "The Oslo paper had been written unprofessionally and in poor English. Some of the ideas seemed confused to me, and other leaned too much towards the Palestinians. I had respect for Peres, [Yossi] Beilin and their aides, but I was afraid that in their enthusiasm over having succeeded in reaching an agreement, they had gone overboard. I was not particularly impressed by their stories of the 'chemistry' between the parties in Oslo. So I went ahead and warned them, in the frankest terms, not to sign such a document."

If Singer is right about the poor English of the document (and assuming that the negotiations were conducted in English), it would explain the widely different interpretations the parties have, the Arab claims and the denials of Peres, Beilin and others.

Singer further writes: "The logical thing to do would have been to throw out the document and start all over again. The orders I received, to my consternation, were to use it as a working paper and make only the changes that were absolutely necessary."

Yoel Singer remained involved in the process. Maybe one day he will write a book about it, and we will have more insight into how the Oslo process was started and managed.

How to give real meaning to 'never forget'

I applaud Chad Finkelstein's final paragraph in his personal March of the Living journal (CJN, June 11). In it he writes, "What one must come away with from a venture like this [a visit to Auschwitz and later to Israel] is a message to give to the world that no such dehumanization can ever happen again...a message that we can never forget."

I agree with Finkelstein wholeheartedly that the purpose of March of the Living should be to raise the consciousness of young Jews and to translate their Jewish sorrow and anger into action.

Therefore, if we feel it is important to send Jewish teenagers to see a place where some of humankind displayed a total disassociation from their soul, it would seem correct that a prerequisite and follow-up to the trip would be for all participants to actively involve themselves in battling against current inhumanities.

The term "never forget" was not meant to encourage a simple passive recollection of the atrocities committed against us. It was a phrase coined to help the Jewish people remember our overwhelming time of anguish so that we would be watchful and aware when inequities happened again, and respond with fervor to douse its authority.

Perspectives

A timeline of the major developments in the exodus of Jews from Ethiopia to Israel.

1980-83 – A few thousand more Ethiopian Jews come out quietly through the Sudan.
1984 – Huge numbers of Ethiopian Jews go to the Sudan trying to get to Israel. Dire conditions lead to the deaths of more than 4,000 en route or in refugee camps.
December 1984 – Operation Moses brings 6,000-8,000 Jews out of Ethiopia. But the Sudanese government brings the operation to a halt after newspapers publish stories on the secret rescue. A mop-up operation brings out fewer than another 1,000.
1985-89 – Several thousand others are quietly brought out by Jewish aid groups and the Israeli government.
January 1990-May 1991 – The numbers of those allowed to emigrate increases to between 8,000 and 10,000 after Ethiopia agrees to allow Israel to reopen its embassy.
May 1991 – Israel launches Operation Solomon, a dramatic 36-hour airlift that brings an additional 14,000 to Israel, including 2,000 Falash Mura.
August 1991 – An Israeli ministerial commission rules that entry to Israel requires "a clear belonging of the converted person to his ethnic roots, clear desire to return to Judaism and a process of return to Judaism."
1992 – 3,500 Jews from Upper Kwara and another 3,000-to 4,000 Falash Mura go to Israel.
1993-present – About 10,000-12,000 Falash Mura leave for Israel, some 5,000-7,000 brought through the compound in Addis Ababa and the rest from northern Ethiopia. Falash Mura all have undergone "return-to-Judaism" procedures.
April 1993 – An Israeli ministerial commission rules that only those eligible under the Law of Return, and some under a very narrow definition for family reunification, may come to Israel from Ethiopia.
June 1997 – After years of political wrangling, the Israeli government decides to allow entry, on humanitarian grounds, to those Falash Mura who have been waiting in the Addis Ababa compound, even if they cannot be admitted under conditions of the Law of Return.
October 1997-June 1998 – Some 4,000 remaining Falash Mura are brought to Israel from the compound in Addis Ababa, where they have been living since the early 1990s.
May 1998 – The government of Israel instructs Jewish aid groups to end their work in the capital.
June 1998 – The government of Israel announces plans to close the compound in Addis Ababa, end immigration from Ethiopia under Law of Entry and process via the Law of Return only those of recent Jewish lineage.

Fourteen years after Israel launched its first dramatic rescue operation of Jews from Ethiopia, those involved in the rescue effort are planning to close up shop. The ostensibly last planeload of Ethiopian Jews to Israel, 58 Falash Mura – Ethiopians who consider themselves Jewish but are not considered Jewish by the Israeli government – arrived at Ben-Gurion Airport two weeks ago, welcomed by top Israeli officials, including Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

But efforts by the Israeli government and humanitarian groups to close down operations in the East African nation are being complicated by reports of atrocities against those still hoping to make aliyah, continuing disputes over the Jewish status of many seeking refuge and urgent pleas from those being left behind.

At the same time, there are an estimated 2,500 Jews in Kwara, near the Sudanese border, who were left off the original rescue list. Israeli government officials say their attention will now turn to them.

Also at issue is the fate of as many as 15,000 Falash Mura. The Israeli government fears that many, if not most, will want to settle in Israel.

At the request of the Israeli government, the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC) closed its compound in the Ethiopian capital of Addis Ababa July 1.

Recent visitors to the northern Ethiopian villages report that one 6-year-old Falash Mura child was burned to death when her family's home was set on fire, and that hundreds have fled from their villages. But these reports have not been confirmed by other sources and are questioned by some involved in the issue.

Meanwhile, these Falash Mura have appealed to Ethiopian Jewish activists not to abandon them.

"We would like to beg of you in the name of the God of Israel to continue your assistance for us," they wrote to the North American Conference on Ethiopian Jewry (NACOEJ). "Please don't abandon us at our time of need, at this time of suffering and grief. Please finish what you have already started."

Debate over the Jewish status of the Falash Mura undergirds the increasingly complex situation in Ethiopia today.

The Israeli government and some Jewish humanitarian officials consider them Christians whose ancestors converted from Judaism generations ago. Others, however, say the Falash Mura didn't actually convert to Christianity, but do not live religious Jewish lives.

Three recent visitors to several northern villages report that Falash Mura are being targeted in "pogroms" and are being burned out of their homes by their Christian neighbors who want to expropriate their property.

In separate interviews from Addis Ababa and Israel, the travellers reported that Christians have set fire to the modest huts, or tukuls, of their Falash Mura neighbors in the middle of the night, waving guns and screaming at them to go to Israel.

Barbara Ribakove Gordon, executive director of the North American Conference, who visited the village of Buchara on June 14, was told that a 4-year-old girl was rescued from the flames of a burning tukul.

Michael Schneider, executive vice-president of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, which has spent upwards of $10 million aiding the Jews and Falash Mura of Ethiopia, is dubious of the reports of violence against the Falash Mura in the northern villages.

"There is no hard evidence to suggest that there either is, or will be an outbreak of pogroms against either Jews or Falash Mura," said Schneider, who sent his own team to investigate.

But several sources say that as a result of the rapidly changing situation, some Falash Mura are fleeing. This has complicated the situation in Addis Ababa, where the JDC and the North American Conference have maintained a compound, providing educational, health and other services for those waiting to immigrate to Israel.

Most of those in the compound were brought to Addis Ababa by Israeli emissaries in the process of preparing for Operation Solomon. They missed the airlift either because they didn't arrive in the capital in time or because their applications weren't processed in time.

Of the 14,000 Ethiopians airlifted to Israel during Operation Solomon, the majority were Jews, but some 2,000 were Falash Mura, many of whom were separated from family members, according to Avi Granot, Israel's former ambassador to Ethiopia and the current minister for public affairs at the Israeli Embassy in Washington.

Operation Solomon followed Operation Moses, a secret airlift that began in late 1984. More than 6,000 Jews were airlifted from the Sudan, where thousands of Ethiopian Jews had trekked. That airlift was suspended by the Sudanese government when it became public.

The rescue of Ethiopian Jewry came after Israel's Sephardi chief rabbi, Ovadia Yosef, issued a ruling in 1973 recognizing the Falashas as Jews who were descendants of the lost tribe of Dan.

Some 65,000 Ethiopians now live in Israel. Controversy has surrounded the question of whether Israel should be responsible for those left in Ethiopia who have questionable Jewish ties.

Amid ongoing disputes over the status of those Falash Mura at the compound in Addis Ababa, an Israeli ministerial committee last year decided to allow all of those waiting to emigrate to come to Israel and then to close down the compound.

Israel "definitely had a humanitarian responsibility for those people" because they were brought to Addis with the "belief that they are on the way to Israel" and they practiced Judaism while living in the compound, Granot said.

But Israel has no obligation to assist others, even if they have family members in Israel, because they are not Jewish, the former ambassador said.

The problem, Granot said, is that all of the Coptic Christians in Ethiopia – even the country's prime minister – could consider themselves to be direct descendants of Jews.

Israel is concerned, Granot said, that if it assists them, "millions of Ethiopians would turn to the Jewish state for refuge from their country's grinding poverty and escalating war with neighboring Eritrea."

When the operations close down, any who believe they have a right to immigrate to Israel will have to apply to the Israeli Embassy in Ethiopia the way any non-Jew would.

Others dispute the view that the stream of Falash Mura would be endless.

A survey of the country's remaining Falash Mura in 1992 recorded about 25,000 names, said Avshalom Elitzur of South Wing to Zion, a social action group. Fewer than 15,000 remain in Ethiopia, most of whom have first-degree relatives in Israel, he said.

The notion that there would be an "endless stream" of Falash Mura into Israel "is a myth cultivated in Israel by those who don't like the idea of more black people there," he said.

Rabbi Moshe Waldman, the representative of Israel's Chief Rabbinate who deals with the Ethiopian immigration, agrees.

"It is absolutely a question of color," he said, pointing to the hundreds of thousands of people from the former Soviet Union who do not claim to be Jewish but have been permitted entry by Israel.

Granot said the charge of racism "is nonsense."

What happens next is unclear.

Israel says the group of Falash Mura, who arrived in Israel two weeks ago, marked the end of the official campaign to reunify Falash Mura families. But dozens more are left at the Addis compound. It is not clear whether Israel will grant them permission to enter the country.

It is Israel's job to reassure the Falash Mura that applications to immigrate will be taken seriously, by sending emissaries to the villages to meet with them, Schneider said.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and his wife Sarah were among the welcoming party for the 58 Falash Mura who arrived in Israel June 25 on the "last" Ethiopian airlift. They are trying to calm an unhappy youngster. The child, however, will not be calmed. [Isranet photo]

Time for new beginnings

The first words are always the hardest. They grab the reader's attention; they make the listener stop and absorb the story you're telling. First words are slow and painful. They are what first year university is all about.

By Jennifer Fox in Halifax

Write something about yourself. That was my first assignment for my Foundations of Journalism course at the University of King's College in Halifax. Something. I wanted specifics; I didn't want to fail. These words were to be the first my journalism tutor and fellow students would read. The cursor on the tiny Macintosh computer screen blinked, demanding that something be written. The clicking of other people's keyboards taunted me. Why was I here? Could I survive four years creating stories out of nothing? My screen remained blank, confirming my fear. I wasn't a future reporter but a fraud, an English student capable of writing only essays and fiction. How did I end up in Halifax?

King's is a small university tucked away in the corner of the Dalhousie University campus. It is three provinces and one time zone away from Thornhill, Ont., the quiet suburb above Toronto where I grew up. I came to King's to become a journalist. There are fewer than a dozen undergraduate journalism programs in Canada and this one seemed to suit me best.

I never considered why my future career should be in this field; yet I knew the image of noisy newsrooms, approaching deadlines and my name in print could always make me smile. But I was terrified. Of the articles I would have to write, of the complete strangers I would have to call. Of explaining how and why I was different, when at home no explanation was needed.

My mezuzah is an object of curiosity on my floor of Alexandra Hall, King's female residence. The mezuzah is something different – foreign.

My fellow student doesn't know what it is – a thin, long and grey rectangle attached to my doorframe. Her hand reaches up, about to pry it off the wall for further examination. I swat her hand away and tell her it's supposed to be there. She apologizes; she didn't know. In her small town in New Brunswick, such an object has never been seen because it's just not needed.

The first time I was questioned, I hesitantly replied that this was a mezuzah. Had she heard the term before? In Thornhill this question isn't asked. People already knew the answer because there's a large Jewish community. But she wants an explanation of this odd word because it's something new. And that's what university is for – to experience new things.

How do I explain something that is so ordinary in my world but is so out of place in hers? Is now the time to get into the story of Pesach? Is the hallway of Alex Hall the right place to describe God passing over the homes smeared with blood? If I hadn't attended public school, but CHAT, the Hebrew high school in Toronto, then maybe I could feel confident about the answers to all of last year's questions. Why don't you eat milk and meat together? Why is your New Year in September? Why are you fasting? Why? I didn't always have the words. I just didn't know.

Now I've got two months to find the right words. To figure out how to explain to my housemates why I brought two sets of dishes for our kitchen and what that weird thing is above my door. Two more months until I'm once again seated in front of a Macintosh with a deadline approaching and no clear idea where to begin. But I'm optimistic. I've done it once before and the second time can't possibly be harder than the first.

Focusing on the future

"It's nice to meet you," I say. The balding man responds, "You look just like your father. Where are you in school these days?"

By Erica Horn in Montreal

For most of my friends, the answer is monosyllabic and self-explanatory. Not for me. I take a deep breath. "I go to McGill," I say, hoping this will satisfy his honest curiosity.

To my dismay, he pursues the issue, "What are you studying?" he asks.

Here we go. "I'm in humanistic studies," I sigh, with a you've-probably-never-heard-of-it expression on my face.

"What is that exactly?" This man is evidently very interested.

"It's an interdisciplinary arts major."

Most people then quickly move on to, "So, what do you want to do with your life?"

Not him. "So, what specifically are you taking?"

This I can answer easily. "A little bit of this, a little bit of that. Some Spanish, Jewish literature, Middle Eastern history, philosophy," and the list goes on.

Finally, he does ask, "So, what do you want to do with this?"

With this? I want to find an abbreviation for my major and its accompanying description, that's what I want to do "with this."

Upon introducing myself to one of the staff reporters at The Canadian Jewish News, for an article he was writing about three of us who created and co-edit the Hillel Hub at McGill, I was asked to state my major and my age. I had just turned 19. You know how it is; the first couple of months after your birthday, you have difficulty remembering that your age has changed so you constantly answer a year younger than you are (or, in the case of my parents, they purposely mislead you).

Then he inquired about my major, figuring that this answer would come more easily.

I offered the same response as I had given to the balding man, but this time, the reporter answered, "I'm a humanistic studies graduate." Funnily, the same conversation occurred when I introduced myself to the executive director of Hillel.

My parents had been concerned because the McGill handbook reads: "Humanistic studies does not prepare you for any specific vocation or graduate school." I was not and am not worried, because the handbook mentions nothing about aimless, hopeless or homeless. My philosophy is that those who are motivated will succeed.

The recent plans to construct the Montreal Jewish Community Campus are an ideal example of recognizing the importance of ensuring a bright future. Members of the community are aware that to guarantee a future for Jews in this city, they must prepare themselves by establishing strong foundations and offering worthwhile reasons to remain here. Faith in the community must radiate from the actions and attitudes of the community's leaders to its members.

I have too many friends who have fled Montreal for Toronto and claim that there is no worthwhile future for young Jews here. I disagree. I am acquainted with many former Montrealers, now Torontonians, most of whom claim that Toronto has become a reborn Montreal. (So why bother moving?)

People involved in the Montreal Jewish community evidently want to end the ripple effect of emigration to Ontario. They are doing so by building a campus and showing a commitment to Jewish life in Montreal. Dedication, diligence and a strong-willed vision for the future are all that are required to ensure happiness and prosperity. A sense of satisfaction is guaranteed provided that the will to remain and rebuild what may seem dwindling is greater than the sensation of simply feeling left behind.

I have no qualms about remaining here. The mere recognition and knowledge that a vibrant Jewish community in Montreal is possible because it once was and still is, is significant enough to ensure a worthwhile future. Although leaders within our community cannot be certain of the exact needs of the members of the Jewish community, simply knowing that you want a strong community to exist is sufficient to drive the dream to become reality. Individuals function in the same way. Having the characteristics and mindframe to succeed in life is more important than the certitude of exactly how you will reach success.

Similarly, just because my major does not have any specific focus for the future, it does not mean that I will graduate knowing nothing about nothing; nor will I be aimless or futureless. In fact, I will know at least a little about many things.

Although it is the summertime (and hopefully El Nino does not have any big plans), it is essential to recognize the importance of focusing on the right things at the right time. Take some sun, and make sure that your tongue doesn't get stuck to the popsicle you have just removed from the freezer.

My next column will be written from Camp Green Lane, on Green Lane Road, in Green Lane, Pa. Hasta la vista, à la prochaine, Shalom.

People like Burg a vanishing breed

Recently, I had the good fortune to be present at a breakfast meeting with Yosef Burg, for 39 years a member of Israel's Knesset and a cabinet minister in many Israeli administrations. Some people have called him a political survivor, but that is putting him down rather than understanding the unusual and in fact extraordinary personality he is.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

After his speech, a number of listeners remarked that people like Burg seem to have vanished from society: men of education, intelligence, compassion and tolerance. He was indeed admirable in his references to historical figures, to incidents of past history, Jewish and general, his capacity to remember names that I had long forgotten – and in his wonderful way of mixing Hebrew, English, German and, of course, Yiddish into one "Burgian" address.

Burg will be 90 years old come next January, and he was in Toronto as part of a gruelling lecture tour. He had received smichah as well as a PhD in Germany, and he has no hesitation to describe his native city, Dresden, as a place in which culture once had an important place. A founder of Israel's National Religious Party, Burg is an Orthodox Jew in a tradition of accepting other denominations with a remarkable degree of openness, and thereby stands in significant contrast to many of his colleagues. In fact, what impressed me most in this latest appearance in our midst was a particular statement that one rarely hears from any politician. He said: "I have been in politics a very long time and when you have that opportunity you also have a chance of being wrong a few times. I was wrong in the 1930s when I opposed – at a Zionist Congress – the recommendations of the Peel Commission, which suggested the partition of Palestine (then under British mandate). I was wrong then, and later when the opportunity arose to correct myself, I did so." I cannot offhand remember anyone else who has made politics his home, and has unequivocally asserted not only that he had made mistakes but was also willing to specify them rather than let it go as generalities.

He answered questions about Israeli politics and his bottom line was this: questions that have bothered the Jewish people for thousands of years cannot be quickly resolved by a nation only 50 years old. He quoted a Yiddish proverb: "Unless you are a bit meshuge, you cannot have a real understanding of our problems."

When asked how we could bring the Jewish people together, his answer was not evasive. He said: "It starts with you yourself and with every one of us. We are all part of the polarization and each of us can reduce the level of distance between us and the 'others' by beginning to speak in softer and more accepting tones."

Burg, whose son is now the chair of the Jewish Agency, belongs to a vanishing breed. He draws on a multitude of intellectual sources and does so with great charm, without putting down his audience. On the contrary, he is one of the few who can manage to pull it up to his own level, and that is an experience of which

Croatians gird for Sakic war crimes trial

Dinko Sakic, the commander of the Jasenovac concentration camp, was deported to Croatia from Argentina last month,

By Sheldon Kirshner

setting the stage for a painful re-examination of Croatia's fascist past and its current fixation with the wartime Ustashe proto Nazi state.

Croatia, absorbed into Serb-dominated Yugoslavia after World War I, won its independence in 1941 under the leadership of Ante Pavelic and the sponsorship and protection of Germany.

The Croatian puppet state, a carbon copy of Nazi Germany according to Marcus Tanner's new book, Croatia: A Nation Forged in War (Yale University Press), persecuted Jews and Serbs. An estimated 750,000 Serbs and 20,000 Jews were killed during the Ustashe period, chiefly in Jasenovac.

Sakic commanded the notorious camp from December 1942 to October 1944. With Croatia's collapse in 1945, Sakic and his wife, Esperenza, the sister of one of the highest ranking Ustashe leaders, fled to Argentina. Juan Peron, the president, permitted thousands of war criminals – Germans, Croatians and others – to find a haven there.

Until last April, Sakic, 76, lived an uneventful life in Argentina as a businessman. But in a television interview, he dropped his guard and acknowledged his role in Jasenovac. He declared, however, that the prisoners under his watch had died of natural causes, mainly typhoid, and had not been murdered. But witnesses tell a different story, one in which inmates were tortured and killed.

With Sakic having been deported to Zagreb, he will become the first member of the Ustashe regime to be tried for war crimes in Croatia, which declared independence from Yugoslavia in June 1991.

Croatia's president, Franjo Tudjman, is an ambivalent figure. During World War II, he compiled a distinguished record as an anti-fascist partisan in Josip Broz Tito's resistance movement. But during Croatia's struggle for statehood in the early 1990s, when he sought to instil patriotic pride among all classes of Croatians, Tudjman invoked a fairly positive spin of the Ustashe state. He admitted that Croatian fascists had been guilty of "wrongdoing," but added that they had been patriots.

In his zeal to reconcile the contradictory strands of Croatian history, Tudjman suggested that Jasenovac be turned into a memorial for all victims of fascism, communism and the 1991 Serb-Croat war. The idea was criticized as morally inappropriate by Croatia's small Jewish community.

Tudjman has not stopped there. In a bid to garner the support of nationalists, the government has taken the following steps: renamed streets in Zagreb – the capital – after Ustashe luminaries; incorporated the checkered Ustashe coat of arms into Croatia's flag; and, in revised school texts, portrayed the Ustashe state not as a willing participant in atrocities, but as a country fighting for nationhood.

Worse still, Tudjman, in 1989, wrote a book, The Wastelands of Historical Reality, in which he accused Jews of inflating Holocaust numbers and charged that Jews had run Jasenovac.

Tudjman has since apologized for these references, which were deleted from the subsequent English-language edition. But his reputation is such that when he appeared at the opening of the United States Holocaust Museum in Washington several years ago, he was roundly booed. And when he announced his intention to visit Jerusalem after Israel and Croatia established diplomatic relations in August 1997, protests forced him to cancel it.

In an effort to make amends, Croatia's foreign minister, Mate Granic, visited Israel two months ago. He condemned the suffering of Jews in Croatia during the war, lambasted the "crime of genocide of six million Jews," and reiterated that Croatia would prosecute Sakic. With Sakic awaiting trial, Croatians are girding themselves for a round of national soul-searching which may tell them more about themselves than they wish to know or acknowledge.

Goldhagen bashers

Two years ago, a young Harvard historian named Daniel Jonah Goldhagen caused quite a stir with the publication of Hitler's Willing Executioners: Ordinary Germans and the Holocaust, which has sold a phenomenal 600,000 copies worldwide.

Put succinctly, Goldhagen's hypothesis was that the Final Solution was largely implemented, not by fanatical Nazis, but by "ordinary" Germans, and that a climate of venomous, "eliminationist" anti-Semitism in Germany paved the way for this unparallelled crime.

The book, by turn brilliant and glaringly weak, was praised and attacked by critics. The latest Goldhagen bashers are Norman Finkelstein and Ruth Bettina Birn, whose book, A Nation on Trial: The Goldhagen Thesis and Historical Truth (Fitzhenry & Whiteside), is based on essays which originally appeared in academic journals. It is doubtless the most sustained barrage so far against the Goldhagen school of historiography.

Finkelstein, a professor of political theory and international relations at Hunter College and New York University, is hard on Goldhagen. He describes his work as one of "scholarly pretention" which "adds nothing to our current understanding" of the Holocaust.

Some of his points are valid, his ill-tempered language notwithstanding. German anti-Semitism in itself was not sufficiently virulent to account for genocide. The Germans were not homicidally anti-Jewish. There were relatively few popular German assaults on Jews. The majority of Germans condemned Nazi atrocities and did not share Hitler's obsession with the Jews. Lastly, in his view, Goldhagen made light of the remarkable successes registered by Jews in German society between the last third of the 19th century and 1933.

Finkelstein, however, falters when he states that Germans "could not tolerate" Nazi assaults on Jews that "outraged their sense of decency." Contrary to Finkelstein's claim, it's abundantly clear that most Germans were not overly troubled by Hitler's policy of isolating and demonizing Jews and subjecting them to a regime of humiliation and terror.

Finkelstein also errs egregiously when he suggests that Israeli leaders and Jews in the Diaspora have expediently exploited the Holocaust to justify Israel's very existence and its "repressive policies." And while this has occasionally happened, I strongly suspect that Finkelstein's visceral anti-Israel animus impairs his judgment and his ability to evaluate the truth nonprejudicially.

Birn, chief historian of the war crimes section in Canada's Department of Justice, suffers from no such blindness. As a result, she can be taken more seriously.

Broadly speaking, she faults Goldhagen on two counts. He relied mainly on secondary sources, and his "evidentiary base" is extremely small.

Disagreeing with his argument that the Nazis were particularly murderous and cruel toward Jewish forced laborers, Birn points out that millions of Soviet prisoners of war were similarly starved to death.

Finally, Birn's greatest gripe concerns his methodology. As she puts it: " He takes selected parts and blows them up out of all proportion. Sweeping generalizations then emerge from these distortions... Had he used a broader source base and applied the comparative method, a truer picture would have emerged."

Furthermore, she observes, Goldhagen never answers two fundamental questions: How widespread and deep-rooted was German anti-Semitism, and to what degree did Germans support Hitler's anti-Jewish measures?

These are legitimate questions, and for the sake of historical veracity, Goldhagen should answer them, if he already hasn't done so.

A vibrant heritage

By PERLITA ETTEDGUI

Being of Sephardi heritage articulates itself very differently in different experiences.

Recently I discovered one woman's sense of being Sephardi in a discussion on a roof top patio overlooking the bustling traffic of downtown Toronto. Mary Benadiba, unit manager for Fashion Television, spoke with me about her perceptions of the past, her professional accomplishments and her personal connection to Israel. My talk with her allowed me to understand one remarkable modern woman's identification with a heritage rooted in centuries of history.

Mary, whose father was born in Morocco, and whose mother came from Spain, confided that she feels "more Sephardi than Jewish in many ways." Although she was born in Toronto, she recalls with nostalgia the fragrant scents of the Mediterranean cuisine, the roaring sounds of family gatherings and always... the laughter. For her, being Sephardi has much more to do with a passion for life, close familial unity, a strong sense of community and a proud tradition, than with strictly religious connotations.

Mary's identifications with her Sephardi roots are not very different from my own. Since I am the second oldest granddaughter in a family of 11 children, the importance and presence of family have always been paramount in my life.

At family functions it is never the beautifully decorated ballrooms, the sumptuous menus or the fashionable wardrobes that are noted by guests. What most non-Sephardi guests note at our parties is the passion – dancing bodies penetrated by the music, laughing children flung in the air, teenagers singing historic verses, and kisses on both cheeks as if they were handshakes.

This passion is what becomes synonymous with the way of life of a people rich in culture, tradition and history. Fuelled by the immigrant experience and the feeling of being uprooted from everything familiar, a generation of children evolved who came to be characterized by an innate drive and need to succeed.

For as long as I can recall, my parents only imposed one requirement on me: that I would pursue with tenacity whatever I truly wanted to do . There were never expectations on what I should do and never any limits on what I could do.

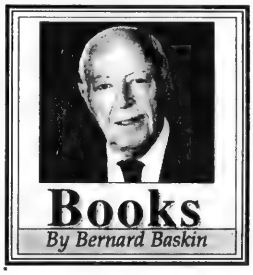
Mejorado Pa Ti (and so it should be for you) is a dictum that has been thrown at me time and again. At wedding parties and baby naming ceremonies, I cannot count how many times older women and family friends have said these words to me. The words eventually became more than a wish. They became an expectation where potential could become realized. Although I understand the literal meaning of these words, the larger meaning is what strikes me as significant. It is what reminds me of Mary, of myself, and of the fire inside so many Sephardi young people that inspires them to persevere.

Closing my eyes and remembering, seeing the scenes of my childhood, I can vividly picture the hands of my grandmother clapping always and the ringing howling of the women, expected as expressions of joy at fiestas.

The seder plate hitting the heads of all the cousins, bringing in the new year with strength and hope. The candies thrown at the bar mitzvah boy, raining a storm of emotion. The chain of names in families honoring the living and joining the younger generations. The henna on open palms shooing all evil eyes away from the bride. The cookies with rose water and honey exuding the aromas of another place and time.

These are the memories that Mary recalls when identifying with her Sephardi heritage.The close family bonds and the boisterous laughter can be found in any home, but joined with the passionate flavor of the music, the dance and the emotion, they characterize a culture unique in history and traditions.

These characteristics are what I think of, as well, when I think of being Sephardi, and they instil in me the same determination and pride that pushes our youth towards the future.



An ambitious novel

Damascus Gate*, by Robert Stone (Houghton Miffin, $35).

At the heart of this multi-dimensional novel is a malady known as "Jerusalem Syndrome." In a recent interview, the author explained that "People suffering from the syndrome are usually pilgrims – Jews, Christians, and Muslims – who feel themselves drawn to Jerusalem.

They become delusional, and believe that God has called them there for an important purpose, or that they are the embodiment of some figure from religious history. The syndrome is so prevalent that there's actually a police detachment specifically trained to deal with people suffering from it."

In this book, the sickness concerns a plot by Christian fundamentalists and Jewish radicals to blow up the mosques on Jerusalem's Temple Mount and thus hasten, for the former, the Second Coming, and for the latter, the rebuilding of the ancient Temple. This storyline is skilfully developed and leads to suspense, intrigue and an exciting climax in the maze of caves beneath the Temple Mount.

A character who fails prey to the dangerous syndrome is Adam De Kuff, a wealthy and learned manic depressive guru in search of ultimate redemption for himself and society. A Jew, unsure about his conversion to Christianity, he is a student of the Kabbalah and esoteric mysticism.

He is manipulated by a self-absorbed American musician and drug addict – a former yeshivah student and follower of Zen – who convinces him to accept the mantle of messiah in an effort to unite all religions and thus prepare for the great tikkun or repair of the world.

All of these events occur in the early 1990s, during the time of the intifadah, around a focal character, Christopher Lucas, an expatriate American freelance journalist. He is a non-practising Catholic and half-Jew who decides to write a book on the Jerusalem Syndrome.

Before long, he finds himself in the midst of a bizarre plot. Intelligent and likeable, Lucas is fascinated by religious faith, although he has little of his own, and is unable or unwilling to make the necessary leap.

He is attracted to beautiful Sonia Barnes, an African-American nightclub singer who is innocently drawn into the sinister workings of the Temple Cabal.

The panoramic cast of characters is rounded out with Nuala Rice, a careworker with the International Children's Foundation, a veteran of Beirut, Somalia and the Sudan, who brazenly smuggles arms to the Palestinians; and Jan Zimmer, a soldier of fortune, who turns out to be an ambiguous hero in a surprising and rather unbelievable conclusion to the novel.

This ambitious novel contains a number of superb set pieces, including a violent confrontation in the Gaza Strip, a chilling trip through riot-torn Jerusalem streets, and a desperate attempt to prevent a bomb from detonating that would bring on Armageddon.

Robert Stone, the author of five novels including Dog Soldiers, A Flag for Sunrise and Outerbridge Reach knows how to maintain reader interest even in a long, somewhat confusing, complex work that includes matters of religious faith, meditations on mysticism, Middle East intrique, tangled relationships and a meticulous rendering of Jerusalem.

A rewarding novel, rich in evoking place and formulating ideas, Damascus Gate is highly recommended.

Web site explores genealogy

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Is there any valid ethical reason why a genealogist should choose not to use the census of non-Teutonic peoples that the Nazis conducted in Germany in 1938-39?

The German Minority Census of 1939 probably was useful for the Nazis when they imposed the Final Solution upon the Jewish people. The research arising from the Nazis' sadistic medical experiments has been deemed inadmissable to medical science. Since the census was used for an evil purpose, should it likewise be considered "treif" ?

This question was the subject of a recent public exchange in the JewishGen discussion group on the Internet.

The 474,464 pages of the original census are located in the Bundesarchiv in Potsdam, Germany. In 1991 the Mormon Family History Library microfilmed them, making them easily accessible to researchers via 292 reels of microfilm. The U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C. also has a set of the microfilms.

Despite the Nazis' reputation for clerical perfectionism, the census, which is organized by census district, is not easy to use. Although the returns for some large cities such as Berlin are arranged alphabetically by surname, there is no overall alphabetical index.

Recently genealogist Harry Stein posted an item on JewishGen in which he questioned the appropriateness of using the census. "I can understand the desire to use any source of information that comes to hand in obtaining information about one's forebears," he wrote. "All the same I would have thought that there are limits and ... that using a Nazi census that seems to have had as its purpose not the enumeration of the Jewish population but their identification for future 'action' (would be highly inappropriate)."

Several participants of the JewishGen forum were quick to defend the use of the census for family tree research. Perhaps the most succinct response came from Julia Bonem of New York: "Are you suggesting that we should not use a valuable piece of information that is out there because it was used to destroy the German Jewish population? I for one have frequently used the Nazi deportation lists, among many other sources, as a way of tracking what happened to my family in Germany in the 1930s.

"It is simply wild to think that we should only use 'untainted' sources for our research. One of the ironies of the Nazi era is that these murderers kept meticulous records on their victims. I will take every available research opportunity to reconstruct the generation they wiped out."

* * *

This exchange and many others are e-mailed to me daily via the JewishGen discussion group. Even when I am facing a tight journalistic deadline, I usually cannot resist a glance at the contents list at the top of each JewishGen transmission.

Each day brings a diversity of issues: for instance, the location of Jewish cemeteries in remote lands, where to find old city directories, the availability of school records from Minsk, and the brief residency of Leon Trotsky in the Bronx. The JewishGen discussion group helps participants learn about diverse aspects of family tree research and sometimes helps them discover new branches of their family trees. Some recent items:

One correspondent requests a modern literal translation of the Biblical phrase "Nin v'neched," which is usually translated as "kith and kin."

Several responses indicate that the word "neched" means "grandson" when used alone, and the full phrase means "descendant."

Always interesting and informative, the JewishGen discussion group is an excellent forum for matters large and small that pertain to Jewish ancestral research. For more information, visit the Web site [http://www.jewishgen.org/].

European travel on the net

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

If this is Thursday, it must be Austria, England and Sweden.

Whether you're spending the summer puttering around your home or lazing around the cottage, you can also visit some of the most spectacular Jewish museums in the world if you have access to the Jewish Highway.

And if you really are planning a grand tour abroad, these sites will help you prepare for your trip.

Please note that the quality of these sites varies greatly. Some offer virtual exhibits that parallel the real thing. Others merely post an overview of their museums with directions and hours of admission. But even that can be helpful for the wandering tourist.

We'll start by touring some of the finest Jewish museums of Europe. The Jewish Museum in Prague in the Czech Republic dates back to 1906 and is located on the site of what was once the Prague Jewish ghetto [http://www.ecn.cz/ort/]. The museum houses a collection of approximately 40,000 artistic artifacts and 100,000 items of printed material. But what I found particularly interesting was that in 1996, the museum opened the education and culture centre "to renew awareness of the Jewish presence in the Czech Republic, a presence that was fully suppressed for more than 40 years under the Communist regime." Recent programs in Czech included a lecture about Shavuot by Chief Rabbi Karol Sidon and a talk by the the Bulgarian ambassador to the Czech Republic on The Destiny of Jews during World War II in Bulgaria.

For hundreds of years, Spain was a focus for the Jewish world. That history is reflected at the Museo Sefardi of Toledo. However, I would have wished for a more extensive site for such an important museum as this [http://www.servicom.es/museosefardi/].

After their expulsion from Spain in 1492, many Jews migrated to the small town of Italy and then to Venice. In 1516, the governor of the republic decided that the Jews had to live in only one area of the city.

Venice's Ghetto Novo became the first ghetto in Europe. I highly recommend visiting The Ancient Ghetto of Venice and the neighboring Jewish Museum [http://www.doge.it/ghetto/indexi.htm] for a taste of the community's history and a glimpse at them today.

During your travels, you will come across Web sites that don't speak English. For a quick, free and often crude translation into English, I recommend Altavista's online translation site [http://babelfish.altavista.digital.com/]. This translation technology is not perfect, but it can help the cyber-tourist whose German, Spanish or French is rusty or non-existent.

Now back to the trip. The Jewish Museum of Rhodes isn't finished yet, but it already has its own Web site [http://www.Rhodes Jewish Museum.org]. The Jewish Sephardi community on the Greek island of Rhodes was once a thriving centre for learning and living. That ended with the Holocaust.

Today, Rhodes is a popular vacation destination, but there has been little to mark its proud history. Thanks to the efforts of Aron Hasson, the museum is taking shape. You can follow its progress at this lovely Web site.

I concede that a virtual voyage may not be as much fun as the real thing. But at least this way, you'll never have to worry about losing your luggage.

Next week, on to London, Vienna, Stockholm and beyond.

CJN article helps reunite Birkenau survivors

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

VAUGHAN — A CJN article has helped reunite two former concentration camp inmates who both cheated death by mere seconds.

For years, one of them, Jack Steinmetz, searched high and low for someone who lived through the same ordeal in Birkenau as he had. It turns out that a fellow survivor was just up the street.

David Mark's experience at Birkenau eerily resemble those of Steinmetz: As teenagers, they arrived at the death camp on the same transport from Hungary; they were on the same work detail; and both narrowly escaped death from the gas chambers.

What's more, the tattooed numbers on their forearms are just 20 digits apart. They call their survival nothing short of miraculous.

What brought them together was an article last spring in The CJN on John Freund, who was marking his 50th year in Canada. Freund, also a Birkenau survivor, was brought to this country in a special war orphans program Canada initiated in 1947.

Steinmetz, now 69, called him to inquire about Birkenau. "He told me, 'You know, I just heard from someone whose story is very similar to yours,' " Steinmetz recalled. That someone was Mark, 68, who lives two blocks from Steinmetz in Thornhill. The two got in touch, and the recollections began.

The similarities of their tales are almost chilling: Both had been deported from northern Hungary in the spring of 1944. At Birkenau, the sister camp of Auschwitz, both were ordered to the same work detail – emptying latrines. And shortly after Yom Kippur, 1944, both found themselves inside Birkenau's gas chamber. They were already stripped naked, crammed inside with hundreds of others awaiting their fate, when a kapo (a prisoner in charge of inmates) and a Nazi officer abruptly arrived to demand young people for a work assignment. Mark was plucked out, and Steinmetz quickly volunteered. The large iron doors were then slammed shut, and the gas turned on.

"Maybe we were a few feet apart," Steinmetz said to his new friend during a recent CJN interview. "Maybe we were," Mark responded with a shrug.

"We went by the crematoria every day," said Steinmetz. "They burned night and day, and the smell was terrible."

Recalls Mark, his voice choking, "I asked someone what happened to my mother. He pointed to the fires coming out of the chimney and said, 'There she is.' I cried and cried..."

Steinmetz lost his entire family to the Nazi murder machine. Mark and two siblings survived.

After forced marches to other camps and incarceration centres, both men were liberated in 1945. Steinmetz arrived in Canada in 1947, while Mark came a year later and settled in Halifax. He moved to Toronto in 1991.

Steinmetz spent years searching for someone who also survived Birkenau's gas chamber. He even went to the huge 1985 Holocaust survivor's conference in Ottawa. He turned up nothing.

"And for the past few years, someone lived two minutes away," he pointed out. "It's a relief to finally find someone who remembers this. I thought I was the only survivor of this group."

Added Mark: "This reminds me of going to a psychiatrist. He [Steinmetz] understands what I'm talking about."

The two men underline what their survival meant: Steinmetz and his wife have two daughters and one grandson, while Mark and his wife have two sons and four grandchildren.

"I will definitely keep reading The CJN," Steinmetz smiled.

'The Boys' hold special reunion

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When The Boys assemble for one of their annual get-togethers, it often resembles something of a family reunion.

There's lots of hugging and kissing, sharing of stories and warm feelings. As children orphaned during the Holocaust, who were brought to England for rehabilitation after the war, the other Boys are often the only family they have.

Weizman attended a dinner held by The Boys at their reunion in Israel, which was held to mark the Jewish State's 50th birthday.

Weizman noted that many of The Boys left England in 1948 for the new State of Israel and served in the Haganah during the fight for independence. Many remained and made outstanding contributions to the state, he pointed out.

For Howard Chandler, 69, the reunions afford the opportunity to meet people who became his family after the war. Along with his wife, Elsa, a long-standing school trustee and past chair of the North York Board of Education, he enjoyed the camaraderie of the most recent reunion.

"It was very emotional because we saw many of The Boys who went to Israel and stayed," he said. "Some held high positions, even in the security establishment. One fellow is retired but he won't say what he did. Some of The Boys called him 007."

Depicted in historian Martin Gilbert's book of the same name, The Boys were a group of about 1,000 young Jewish orphans brought to England after the war.

Chandler, a native of the Polish town of Wierzbnik, near Radom, was liberated in Theresienstadt, a Nazi camp in Czechoslovakia. After passing a physical exam, he and 300 others were ferried to England, in his case aboard a converted Lancaster bomber.

They were taken to an aircraft factory in Windermere in northern England for rehabilitation. There, "we made friendships that last until today," he said.

Of the 300, about 20 live in Toronto, with the majority remaining in England or in Israel. Smaller clusters of orphans made their way to the United States, Zimbabwe, South Africa, Argentina and Brazil – anyplace they had relatives, he said.

Chandler had two aunts in Toronto, Faigie Hochberg and Yentl (Jennie) Obsbaum. He joined them after two years. His brother, Harry, remained in England.

Most of The Boys lost all their families in the Holocaust. "This was our family. We didn't have anybody else," he said.

"I think the relationships that developed between The Boys is the kind of warm relationship that doesn't even develop in families," said Elsa. "When we see each other, the kissing among the boys and girls is something to behold."

Jews urged to oppose UN resolutions on Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Toronto Jews should urge their government to stand beside Israel and the United States to oppose United Nations resolutions that regularly condemn the Jewish state, a select group of major campaign contributors was told last week.

Israel is targeted for at least 20 condemnatory resolutions each year, a figure that persisted even during the tenures of Prime Ministers Yitzhak Rabin and Shimon Peres, said Jeane Kirkpatrick, former U.S. ambassador to the UN. Only the United States and Micronesia regularly support Israel in voting against the resolutions, Kirkpatrick said.

Last year, Israel was formally charged by the Palestinian representative to the UN of inoculating several hundred Palestinian children with the AIDS virus. "That charge was so shocking that even the chair of the Human Rights Commission, a Czech, protested that attack on the State of Israel." But instead of expunging the record of that "scurrilous attack," the chair backtracked after a collective visit by several Arab ambassadors. Kirkpatrick speculated there were "not so subtle" threats of retaliation directed against the Czech Republic.

Kirkpatrick was the keynote speaker during a recent UJA Federation Tribute Evening in honor of 50 years of past campaign chairs. The event was designed to coincide with the celebrations marking Israel's 50th birthday.

A political scientist and syndicated columnist, Kirkpatrick was lavish with her praise for Israel, saying it shared many similarities with the United States. Both states are vigorous democracies that honor pluralism and the rule of law. Both states were founded by people who thirsted for freedom, who were "fleeing persecution and who dreamed of creating a new civilization.

"Israel is a great success by any standard of nation-building" even though it has three times been the subject of foreign aggression – in 1948, 1967 and 1973, she said.

Turning to the Oslo peace process, Kirkpatrick said "Israel is still taking risks for peace and is committed to peace in a way that is virtually unique in our century."

Citing the Israeli civilian death toll in the wake of the Oslo accords (259 killed by terrorists) and Israel's deployment out of Hebron, Kirkpatrick said "the friends of Israel can be comfortable in the realization that the Jewish state [has not] slowed the search for peace."

In return for its withdrawals, Israel only asks for one thing in return, "security for civilians," Kirkpatrick said.

Israel will require even more solidarity and vigilance from its friends in the future, she added.

In other addresses, Campaign for 50 co-chair Brent Belzberg said the UJA's annual fundraising "will move towards a $50-million goal that will forever change our campaign and our community.

Jeane Kirkpatrick

"We're not just looking for incremental increases, we must take a giant leap forward and move this community to a whole new level," he said.

Belzberg said the rapid growth of the Toronto Jewish community, coupled with huge cutbacks in government funding, have necessitated a more aggressive approach.

"Today we are are a booming community of at least 175,000. However, with all this growth has come a sharp increase in the number of our elderly, our poor, our disabled, our immigrants and our children…not to mention our overseas commitments." As a result, the annual campaign must develop to meet these needs and ensure that "the circle of tzedakah and community will carry on forever," Belzberg said.

Jewish Lions aid community

By FRANCES KRAFT

TORONTO — Karen Weinryb is one grateful mom. At a recent program at Zareinu Educational Centre, an emotional Weinryb thanked members of the Forest Hill Lions Club (FHLC) for funding a one-on-one worker to help her 5-year-old son Max, a Zareinu student who has cerebral palsy and is severely disabled.

"You have changed our lives, and improved Max's life," she said.

"We were really concerned that despite the excellent program at Zareinu, Max wouldn't be able to enjoy the program to his full potential…He went from sitting on the sidelines to being involved in all the activities, and from being distracted to being motivated and focused. Without your support, Max would not have progressed as he has this year."

At Zareinu alone, the FHLC has funded a number of projects, including the recent purchase of specialized physiotherapy equipment to help disabled children learn to walk.

Zareinu is one of many beneficiaries of the club's generosity. In the 45 years since its inception, FHLC – the only Jewish Lions' club in Toronto – has raised over $2.3 million for projects such as hospital expansion campaigns, and purchase of medical equipment and taxi chits (to enable people to keep medical appointments, visit a loved one in hospital or attend a class to further employment opportunities), according to outgoing president Sol Mednick, who joined in 1967.

The 50 members are dedicated individuals, said Mednick. To raise most of their funds, they run frequent bingos and used to run casinos. An annual donor dinner also raises a substantial amount.

The Lions, who meet twice monthly at the Columbus Centre, are also involved in hands-on philanthropy, with the delivery of food baskets to needy families at Christmas, Chanukah, Easter and Passover, and the delivery of hot food and warm clothing to street people during the winter through a Hunger Patrol program.

One of the group's most recent involvements is the funding of a project called SWAT (Students With A Target), in which students and police work together to resolve problems in a school.The project is a partnership with Metropolitan Toronto Police 33 Division's community response unit, the North York Board of Education, the Toronto Separate School Board and le Conseil des Ecoles Françaises de la Communauté Urbaine de Toronto.

"Each project is personally investigated by our members," said Mednick. "Before money is authorized, we do an investigation. Then it's brought to our project chairman …and a committee discusses it. The whole process can take about two to three weeks."

"They do a lot of incredible work," said Florence Weinberger, communications manager at Jewish Family & Child Service. "They bend over backwards to be very responsive whenever possible. They're very responsible with their allocations. They ask all kinds of pertinent questions."

Mednick estimates that five or six times a year, a request is deemed to be "an outright emergency," for which individual members are authorized to spend $100.

The FHLC belongs to a network of clubs with 1.2 million members worldwide – the largest service organization in the world, said Mednick.

"Our theme has always been to …help people in need," said Moe Emer, who is one of two charter members still active in FHLC. (The other is Mickey Snow.)

"The Lions are one of my particular favorites," said Emer. "There's a lot of camaraderie, and seeing our club being able to [help] is very rewarding for me, especially these days, when there's so much help needed."

Yitzhak Rabin H.S. graduates first students

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

Elisheva Braun, Tehillah Engel, Lila Kagedan and Rochel Kaiserman sat proudly on the bimah in the presence of over 200 guests including family, friends, staff, community leaders and clergy.

Prior to sharing his d'var Torah, Rabbi Reuven Bulka of Congregation Machzikei Hadas offered his warm wishes and expressed admiration for both the graduates and "those whose efforts have made this possible."

Ottawa's only Jewish high school began a mere three years ago and has grown steadily, both in size and in programming. It now offers a full academic curriculum including both core and extended French, a Judaic studies program, sports and recreational programs, leadership development activities and a variety of field trips.

The school operates on a collaborative philosophy, encouraging input and participation from students, parents and staff.

School board chair Dr. Neima Langner who was one of the founders of the school, reminisced about the early days when the school was just a dream and the dreamers frequently faced negative attitudes. She recalled, however, that they also "heard positive voices, voices of belief," and said she was grateful to those who believed in the dream.

She said Paul Bregman, vice-chair in charge of fundraising for the school, would be "graduating with our first graduating class. He is stepping down from the board and all his official duties." Describing Bregman's incredible energy, creativity and drive to get things done, Langner called him "a whole organization rolled up into one man."

Shirley Schildkraut, director of student services served as the evening's MC. She praised Langner for her dedication and untiring efforts on behalf of the school, described her as "the vision, the driving force behind the existence of Yitzhak Rabin High School."

Rabbi Howard Finkelstein, director of Judaic studies, spoke to the four graduates and presented each of them with a copy of Tehillim Treasury. The graduates in turn presented a mezuzah to the school, their "home away from home."

The keynote address was given by Dr. Aviva Freedman, who has been closely involved with the school since its inception. "The good news is that very few doors are closed to Jews and very few doors are closed to women," she told the graduates. They will have many opportunities open to them and many choices to make. However, this is also the bad news, she said, because choices lead to temptation. She advised them to follow the teachings and values they have learned during their years at Yitzhak Rabin High School and wished them every success.

Awards were presented to students in all grades for their accomplishments. Following the singing of Hatikvah, a reception was held in the synagogue's social hall.

'Miracle' families gather for bash

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — In the fall of 1938, a group of 38 Jewish refugees from Czechoslovakia arrived in Canada.

Recently, they, their children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren, cousins, in-laws and a few close friends – around 200 people – gathered at the Mount Hope Community Centre and Library for their group picnic, which has been an annual event for 22 years.

And this one was special – it celebrated their 60th anniversary in Canada.

They came from the Hamilton area, Toronto, and as far away as Germany, Wisconsin, South Carolina and Illinois.

Tables were laden with bowls of salads, stacks of bagels and home baking – a far cry from their first meal in an old stone farm house between Mount Hope and Caledonia, where they had no heat, not enough beds or blankets, and their only food was the frozen apples and frozen potatoes that had remained unharvested.

Those early days were vividly recalled by Dan Iggers, grandson of the late Karl Abeles, "our Moses," who had led them out of Czechoslovakia in the nick of time.

"If it hadn't been for Karl Abeles," said Iggers, "we would all have been ashes."

Abeles, an experienced farm administrator, had convinced Canadian immigration officials that all those in the group were working farmers. It was their only hope of gaining entry into Canada.

"You were a miracle," said guest of honor, historian Harold Troper, who described the desperate struggle of the Sudeten Jews of Czechoslovakia to gain entry into Canada in his book, None is Too Many, written with Irving Abella.

"I don't know whether the government knew that this group were Jews," but Canada at that time was a very different world, Troper said. Although there were a small number of Jews in Canada, they were outsiders and not part of Canada and "it was not in the Canadian mind," he said, that Jews could be farmers and contribute to Canadian agriculture.

However, when Abeles died in 1954, a Brantford newspaper described him as "the most important immigrant of his generation" for his introduction to Canadian agriculture of a system of permanent pasture, which gained him a place in the Agricultural Hall of Fame in Milton.

Other family members, Joe Loewith, his wife Minna (Abeles' niece), and their sons, Carl and David, are award-winning farmers, as are some of their cousins.

HAMILTON — To celebrate their partnership with Shalom Village, students of George R. Allan elementary school recently presented residents of Shalom Village with a "gift of song" at a special year-end assembly.

Twenty-five residents attended the closing program of GRANDPALS – George R. Allan Nurtures Dedicated People Advocating Literacy with Seniors.

The seniors tapped their toes, clapped and sang along as the children performed songs in English, Hebrew and French. They listened to a recorder group and applauded enthusiastically as Shalom Village administrator, Pat Morden, was presented with a plaque "so that our partnership with Shalom Village will be recorded forever."

GRANDPALS is an intergenerational learning program, conceived by teacher Beverley Lasky as a program to promote literacy when she was appointed school librarian.

"Kids develop better literacy skills through listening, talking and reading aloud," Lasky explained.

However, in the two years since it began, it has become a good deal more than a literacy program.

Once a week, a class of about 20 children, accompanied by a teacher and a parent, visit nearby Shalom Village where they are paired with a resident. The students read stories or poems they have written, read a favorite book, or chat with the seniors. As well, there are various group activities.

A Grade 4 student said "We have all shared many things with our Grandpas – stories, songs, crafts, games and, of course, wonderful refreshments."

'Inspiring program'

What the program means to both generations was perhaps best expressed by a Grade 5 student at the assembly. "I found myself enjoying the conversation and I forgot that the lady that was talking to me was someone I had just met. I will always remember this conversation because when it was over, the lady held my hand, kissed me and whispered that she hoped I would come back.

"In fact, she said that on Mondays when the children come from George R., the sun always shines for her. I know that her name was Anna. I shall always remember her."

Ward I Alderman, Mary Kiss, brought greetings from Mayor Bob Morrow and told students and teachers that GRANDPALS "is a truly inspiring program."

Shalom Residences expands

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Shalom Residences Inc. recently officially opened its fifth home in Winnipeg. About 70 people were on hand for the affixing of mezuzot.

Based on the Reena concept in Toronto, Shalom Residences was established in 1980 to provide homes in a Jewish setting for Jewish adults with developmental disabilities. The homes all observe kashrut and the residents celebrate Shabbat and the Jewish holidays.

All five homes are in north Winnipeg. The latest addition has three residents, one is 25 and the other two are 31.

"One of them needed to live in a smaller setting," says Shalom Residences administrator Nancy Hughes. "His needs are complex."

There are currently 23 people in Shalom Residences' care, three-quarters of whom are Jewish. The organization receives substantial funding from the provincial government, so it cannot be restricted to Jewish clients.

In addition to the five homes the group operates, Shalom Residences has also begun moving some residents into their own apartments.

"We are at a turning point now," says Hughes. "We have to determine how much longer we can still remain a community within ourselves. The demand is there, but to do a good job, we have to move cautiously."

She reports that all social service organizations received a five percent increase in funding from the government this year. She notes that Shalom Residences also raises about $90,000 in the community each year to make up the rest of its funding needs.

The organization is also facing a new challenge. Two of its clients with Down syndrome have developed Alzheimer disease, Hughes says.

"There is a high incidence of Alzheimer disease among people with Down syndrome," she says. "We have had to bring in long-term care staff and train other staff members in nursing care."

Quebec to aid historic shul

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The future of the historic little synagogue at the corner of Bagg and Clark streets seems assured with Culture Minister Louise Beaudoin's announcement that the Quebec government will spend up to $230,000 to renovate and restore the building.

Admitting she was a little nervous at the prospect of speaking in a synagogue for the first time, Beaudoin said from the bimah that the government recognizes the historic and heritage value of the synagogue, because it is "a reminder of a longstanding tradition and a past with which not many Quebecers are familiar."

The money is coming from the Religious Heritage Foundation of Quebec, established three years ago. It has a total budget of $50 million to distribute to houses of worship of all faiths in the province deemed to be of architectural or historical value that are in need of repair, as well as for the restoration of religious art and objects.

Beaudoin, who emphasized the important presence of the Jewish community in Quebec since the mid-18th century, also announced that the interdenominational foundation is studying 13 other restoration projects pertaining to Jewish religious artifacts, such as parchments, furnishings, and gold and silverware, the oldest dating back to the 15th century, housed in Montreal synagogues.

Congregation Temple Solomon, as it is officially named, is the first synagogue to benefit from the program.

Better known as Beth Shloime, or simply the Bagg Street Shul, the synagogue is the oldest in continuous use in Montreal and the only one in what was once the heart of the Jewish immigrant district.

Beth Shloime last year received $80,000 of the $230,000, which it has spent on urgently needed repairs to the exterior brick, the metal work around the roof, the canopy and the stairs.

The latest instalment of $150,000 will enable the shul to replace the windows, which number about 25, repair the roof, install an alarm, and do the basic work to upgrade the heating, electrical and plumbing systems, said president Joe Brick, the retired electrician who has kept the synagogue going almost singlehandedly for the past 30 years.

All work must be approved by the foundation before the funds are remitted.

The building itself dates back to before 1900 and was a residential duplex when the congregation bought it and extended it out the back in 1920.

The congregation itself was founded in 1906 and first met in a rented flat on Viger Street, later moving up to St. Lawrence Boulevard near Prince Arthur.

UWO grads help launch new Jewish student activist group

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Two recent University of Western Ontario graduates are among a small group who have formed an Ontario Jewish student activist organization.

The new group, known as The Link, is an "unofficial revival of Network," the national student activist group which ceased operations in 1996, according to organizers Michael Bloom and Mark Zelunka, political co-chairs at Western's Jewish Student Union (JSU) this past year.

The Link draws heavily for inspiration from Network, the former Canadian arm of theWorld Union of Jewish Students, Bloom and Zelunka said.

Unlike Network, however, The Link – at least for now – will be province-wide, not Canada-wide, and, unlike Ontario-wide Kol Hastudentim, it will be politically oriented, they added.

Among the group's goals are Israel advocacy, ensuring that "good speakers on Israel" visit Ontario campuses, providing information to students writing responses to anti-Israel propaganda, and taking a proactive role in the Toronto Jewish community, perhaps through activities like delivering Meals on Wheels.

The group also hopes to foster Jewish pride and a connection to the Jewish community among students.

Its first event, a rally to free Jonathan Pollard, is scheduled for later this summer.

Bloom and Zelunka were the first Canadians to participate in the Soref Advanced Seminar, a Washington, D.C. conference on Middle East politics for Jewish students, which they attended in May.

The seminar is an annual event run by The Washington Institute for Jewish Leadership and Values. Bloom and Zelunka, who are both entering the University of Toronto (Bloom to study Medicine; Zelunka to continue his studies in Economics), were the only Canadians among 20 students accepted to the conference.

As co-directors of the JSU's Politics and Israel Affairs committee, Bloom and Zelunka sought to counter anti-Israel programming at Western. The task was "extremely challenging," wrote Bloom in his conference application.

First Canadians to participate

Among the difficulties they encountered were Arab protests during their Israel Day program and the cancellation of a jointly sponsored Peace Day with the Arab Students' Association. The repercussions from the latter event provided weeks' worth of material in The Gazette, Western's student paper.

"When [students who are not knowledgeable] see anti-Israel propaganda, they might believe it," said Bloom. "They might distance themselves from it."

At Western, the long-time friends wrote political commentaries in the JSU newsletter and on its Web site, including news from Israel not accessible in mainstream North American media.The pair would also "go to all the anti-Israel speakers [on campus] and try to diplomatically challenge what they were saying," said Bloom.

"[Jewish student] activism is below standard," said Zelunka, noting that he and Bloom were often the lone voices at such events.

At Soref, the two 21-year-olds compared notes with their counterparts from other North American campuses. "You get the sense," said Zelunka, "that the Arab and Muslim communities are becoming very large."

"And they're all very in the know," added Bloom, "even though what they're saying may be false. The Jewish students are not able to articulate a proper response."

Bloom, whose background is "modern Orthodox," prefers to describe himself as a "passionate Jew and Zionist." He says he is passionate about Jewish causes because "when I see an injustice in the world, especially when it affects me and my community, it's something I can't not react to."

Zelunka, who has become more observant over the last few years (his family is Conservative), originally took an interest in politics and activism because he thought it was "kind of cool. Now I see myself having a religious obligation to look out for my fellow Jew."

Senior graduates from U of T

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Like any other new graduate, Joe Fromstein is pondering his options. An aspiring poet, Fromstein said he's considering taking up writing full time now that he's completed his B.A.

He recently attended graduation ceremonies for Woodsworth College's 500 graduates at University of Toronto's (U of T) Convocation Hall.

But unlike most of the people collecting their diplomas, Fromstein is retired and a grandfather of four.

According to a U of T spokesperson, he was one of only 10 seniors to graduate this year. Fromstein's convocation took place just weeks after his 80th birthday.

Fromstein, a retired pharmacist, said his late wife encouraged him to go back to school after he sold his Ossington Avenue pharmacy in 1984.

He said he always loved learning, and even studied Portuguese to better serve his Portuguese-speaking clientele. On the advice of his wife he enrolled at U of T and took one course every year.

The subjects he studied included Greek mythology, English and linguistics. While academia was hard work, he said, he enjoyed the challenge.

Being the oldest student was never a problem, according to Fromstein. "I was immediately accepted as one of the gang...Once I came to class and the students thought I was the professor. I was the only old guy there."

Born in Toronto, he attended King Edward Public School and Harbord Collegiate. In May of 1940, he graduated from the College of Pharmacy, which is now affiliated with U of T, and by June he had enlisted in the air force.

Fromstein went overseas – first to England in 1941 – as part of the medical unit, where he began writing poetry, he said. "During the war if something impressed me I wrote it down." He landed in Europe a day after D-Day.

He married Bertha Riba in 1948; they had three children Stephen, Michael and Rhonda. He is still grief-stricken by Bertha's death from cancer two years ago, he said. "We had 47 wonderful years together."

Over the years, Fromstein has written humorous poetry and speeches for simchahs.

People enjoyed his humor so much they often sought his help for their special occasions, he added. "I would get requests from cousins for anniversaries and birthdays."

But now he plans to spend more time writing serious poetry. He said he was inspired by noted local poet Linda Stitt.

He said after attending one of Stitt's poetry readings two years ago, he was so impressed with her, he wrote 22 responses to her poems. Stitt has since invited him to participate in several poetry readings with her, he noted.

"When I write a poem that is comparable in quality, I really feel that I've accomplished something. Just to be accepted as her equivalent is something."

Fromstein is also the editor of Skyviews, a publication he writes and edits for Skyview Condominium on Yonge Street where he resides. "I write editorials solving the problems of the world," he joked.

Deadlock in talks could lead to violence: Mubarak

By HERB KEINON and STEVE RODAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — After a summit with Palestinian Authority (PA) Chairman Yasser Arafat and Jordan's King Hussein, Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak warned last Sunday that the deadlock in peace talks and Israel's plan to expand Jerusalem could ignite violence that may prove unstoppable.

A top PA official said, moreover, that the Oslo accords are dead and that the recent confrontation in Gaza between Palestinians and the IDF could lead to eruptions throughout the West Bank.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu deflected the criticism, placing the blame for the impasse in the peace process squarely on the PA.

"The present situation is very difficult," Mubarak told a news conference in Cairo, flanked by Arafat and Hussein. "We're afraid that if the situation continues in this manner, violence will erupt. The Israeli government must understand that if the danger begins, the situation will be very difficult to control."

Netanyahu countered that "the agreement on the second redeployment is being held up by the Palestinian side's failure to keep its commitments.

"Israel expects the Palestinians to fulfil these obligations in practice," Netanyahu said, "by detaining terrorists, collecting illegal arms, outlawing terrorist organizations, stopping incitement against Israel, reducing the Palestinian Police to the number prescribed by the Oslo agreement, handing over murderers, and cancelling the sections of the Palestinian Covenant that call for Israel's destruction.

"Threats and violence are not the way to make progress in the peace negotiations," he added.

The prime minister was also critical of the very convening of the summit.

"Israel is working toward the achievement of a peace agreement with the Palestinians," he said. "There is no substitute for direct bilateral negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians disrupted by the Palestinian Authority 15 months ago."

Netanyahu called on Jordan and Egypt to influence the PA to live up to its commitments under the Oslo accords.

The plan to extend Jerusalem's municipal services, approved by the cabinet in June, also calls for the annexation of Jewish suburbs inside Israel to ensure a Jewish majority of 70 percent in Jerusalem, where the PA hopes to set up the capital of a future state.

The three leaders urged Israel to rescind the decision, and Mubarak warned that the situation "will hurt the Israeli people."

Netanyahu's communications director David Bar-Illan said that by convening the summit, "the Palestinians are hoping to create pressure on Israel. This will not work."

PA cabinet secretary Ahmed Abdul Rahman told the Voice of Palestine radio station that a full Arab summit should be convened where Arab countries would take action against Israel.

Mubarak said such a summit would be convened only at the "appropriate time," as a last resort.

"We say that [the peace process] is dead, that it is dying and that the American side is planting in us false hopes. Because of this, the sole outcome in the territory is that Israel is stealing our land, destroying our homes and changing our history," Abdul Rahman said.

Gaza Preventive Security chief Mohammed Dahlan warned of a "hot summer" of confrontations between Palestinians and Jewish settlers. "I believe that the situation could explode at any moment," he said.

PA-aligned newspapers quoted similar warnings by senior Palestinian officials, saying the standoff between PA and Israeli forces in Gaza over the weekend could signal the start of the breakdown of relations.

Abdul Rahman also called on Arab countries to freeze relations with Israel until it agrees to implement the interim accords with the Palestinians. He termed Netanyahu an "arrogant man who is committed to the settlements, and to raiding and seizing land."

Palestinian Justice Minister Freih Abu Medein warned of what he termed a "genocidal war" against the Palestinian people.

Hebron attacks may be work of organized groups: authorities

By MARGOT DUDKEVITCH
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Security officials are concerned that the recent series of attacks on Arab property in the Hebron area may be the work of an organized group.

Sunday morning, four vegetable stalls belonging to Palestinians near the Avraham Avinu enclave in Hebron were torched. Police are still trying to determine whether the arson was carried out by persons involved in last week's vandalism and if the recent incidents are the work of an extremist underground.

Judea and Samaria police spokesperson Opher Sivan said police are taking steps to put a halt to the wave of violent attacks on Arab property. He refused to divulge details, but said police are still seeking two of the suspects involved in the attack.

Netanel Nir, one of several persons who allegedly participated in a horseback assault on Arab property in Hebron, has been arrested.

"Nir is not cooperating with police and is maintaining the right to remain silent," said Sivan.

Former police inspector-general Assaf Hefetz said Sunday that police assisted the IDF operating in the area in quelling attacks by extremists on both sides.

"I hope it doesn't mark the establishment of an underground. Security forces must be alert and intelligence must be strong in order to prevent or quell such incidents," Hefetz said.

Hefetz warned that as decisions by the government on a further West Bank withdrawal become imminent, extremists on both sides may attempt to cause disturbances.

Residents from Kiryat Arba and Hebron condemned the attacks. They said it was unfair that their name is being besmirched because of the activities of several extremists.

Tzuri Popovitch, a spokesperson for Kiryat Arba, said the entire community regretted the harming of Arabs.

"We hope that those who may be considering similar actions in the future will think twice. We demand that justice be meted out against the perpetrators of the act."

MK Hanan Porat (NRP) echoed the sentiment. Speaking on Israel Radio, he said, "We must under no account accept such hooliganism."

Commission considering sanctions against Swiss banks

By DANIEL KURTZMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — In clearing the way for punitive measures against Swiss banks, American public finance officials have unleashed a forceful salvo in what is turning into a war of attrition over Holocaust-era claims.

Ignoring strong objections from the Clinton administration, a commission representing hundreds of state and local finance officials decided last week to lift a moratorium on sanctions against the banks, after settlement talks with Jewish groups reached what one official described as "a total, stone-like impasse."

California said it would become the first state to impose sanctions by not seeking new investments with U.S. subsidiaries of Swiss banks, and New York said that among other steps, it would bar short-term investments, with the banks if there is not a settlement by Sept. 1. New Jersey and Pennsylvania also announced they would take action.

New York City Comptroller Alan Hevesi, who heads the five-member commission, said he hoped U.S. officials would impose a graduated process of sanctions that may give participants in the negotiations "a little more time to resolve the issues."

Swiss banks lambasted the move and threatened to sue U.S. states or cities that adopt boycotts. The Swiss government called the sanctions "counterproductive, unjustified and illegal," and said the move could disrupt U.S.-Swiss relations and trigger a free trade dispute.

Talks between Switzerland's three largest banks and Jewish negotiators broke down last week after Union Bank of Switzerland, Swiss Bank Corp. and Credit Suisse Group said that $600 million was their final offer to settle claims over Holocaust-era bank deposits.

The World Jewish Congress (WJC) and lawyers for Holocaust victims rejected the amount as "insulting" and are holding out for a $1.5-billion "global settlement" that would cover all claims against the banks, the Swiss central bank and the Swiss government.

The funds would go to Holocaust survivors and their heirs.

It is not clear after the most recent developments where the settlement talks stand. After the Hevesi commission announced its verdict, the Swiss banks reportedly were considering revoking their $600 million offer.

Stuart Eizenstat, U.S. undersecretary of state for economic affairs, who began brokering talks between the two sides last December, expressed disappointment at the lapse of what he called a "historic opportunity for resolving this matter that may not come again soon."

In blunt remarks to the finance officials, Eizenstat urged them not to slap sanctions on the banks and warned that such a move could lead to a hardening of positions on both sides.

Speaking to reporters, Eizenstat had said earlier that while pressure on Switzerland may have played an important role in the past, "our belief is that sanctions or the threat of sanctions have made the Swiss public more inflexible [and] have contributed to an environment in which further progress becomes more difficult."

Jewish groups, frustrated by what they felt was a lack of good faith by the banks, took a different view of the matter.

Edgar Bronfman, head of the WJC, which in March had asked the finance officials to hold off on sanctions while efforts to reach a settlement continued, told the commission the WJC would no longer stand in the way of sanctions.

In an interview the next day, Elan Steinberg, executive director of the WJC, rejected the State Department's concerns about a hardening of Switzerland's stance, saying, "There's no stance to harden. Either you return what was stolen or you don't. This is not a bazaar at which we are haggling over a price.

"We will win, we will lose, but we won't be swindled. We will struggle for justice," he said.

Other developments last week also served to increase pressure on Switzerland:

• Lawyers representing five Holocaust victims filed a new class-action lawsuit against Switzerland's central bank to recover plundered gold acquired by Switzerland during World War II.

The lawsuit asks the U.S. District Court in Washington to award compensatory and punitive damages stemming from what it called the "unlawful behavior" of the Swiss National Bank.

The Swiss government and the Swiss National Bank have refused to join the commercial banks in negotiations with Jewish groups and have said they would not be a part of any settlement.

A spokesperson for the Swiss government in Bern blasted the suit, saying it is "not justified by the facts, politically unacceptable and legally untenable."

• A separate group of four Holocaust survivors filed a new state lawsuit in California against three commercial Swiss banks, alleging that the banks' behavior violated California's Unfair Competition Act.

The new suits are in addition to a pending multibillion-dollar class-action lawsuit filed in New York against the three Swiss commercial banks. In the absence of a settlement, lawyers for Holocaust survivors have threatened to pursue that litigation as well.

Eizenstat said the standoff with Switzerland should be resolved in court if agreements cannot be reached, but cautioned against that scenario, which could lead to protracted litigation. "It is very important," he said, that a settlement "be reached quickly and in the lifetime of survivors. This is a race against the clock."

Meanwhile, some positive news has emerged for Holocaust survivors who are awaiting compensation:

• U.S. and British officials announced that the remaining gold looted by the Nazis from European central banks had been returned and about three-quarters of it would be donated to an international fund set up by the two countries last year to benefit Holocaust survivors.

With contributions from 16 countries, including eight European countries that donated part or all of their share of residual Nazi gold held by the Tripartite Gold Commission, the fund now stands at $57.5 million and is expected to increase.

The gold commission was set up by the United States, Britain and France after World War II to return looted Nazi gold to nations from which it was plundered.

Officials said payments from the fund, which is separate from a humanitarian fund established by Switzerland last year, are slated to be distributed to Holocaust survivors in eastern Europe through the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee as early as next month.

• The United States and 38 other nations announced a drive to identify art stolen from Holocaust victims and to compensate their heirs.

Milo leads push against religious coercion in Israel

By HAIM SHAPIRO
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

TEL AVIV — Warning against increasing haredi control of life in Israel, Tel Aviv Mayor Ronni Milo said we could soon expect to see women television broadcasters wearing only "modest" clothing, like the women wrapped in veils on Iranian television.

Milo was speaking at a news conference following the opening meeting of a new group, the Joint Headquarters for Freedom of Religion for Israel.

Joining Milo were Jewish Agency Chair Avraham Burg and Prof. Uriel Reichman, a longtime advocate of a constitution for Israel.

The group includes such groups as the Reform and Conservative movements, Na'amat, Am Hofshi, and Hemdat.

"We are facing a basic question of whether Israel is to be a free state, where everyone will be free to follow his or her own path, or whether it is to be a theocracy," Milo said.

Milo, who said that he comes from a traditional family and attends synagogue on Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, asserted that Haredim are controlling more and more aspects of life in Israel.

The latest threat, he said, was to appoint a director-general for the Antiquities Authority who would make it virtually impossible to conduct archeological research in the country.

The new coalition, he said, would press for the passage of a basic law: Freedom of Religion, which would include the right for everyone to marry in either a religious or civil ceremony, or divorce the same way.

Milo said his cooperation with Burg does not mean that Burg is about to join his proposed centrist party, with which Milo intends to run for prime minister.

Burg said that the group intends to free the government from the clutches of the haredi parties. He added that he hopes to include within the coalition religious Zionists, groups from the Orthodox world and even Haredim.

However, no Orthodox group was represented at the organizing meeting.

New compensation plan

One group is comprised of survivors who have been denied compensation because their annual income exceeded $16,000 (US) for a single person, or $21,000 for a married couple.

But for roughly 4,500 survivors around the world who meet this criteria when their government old-age or pension cheques are excluded, compensation now will be available.

The new agreement excludes U.S. Social Security payments from income tabulations for those aged 70 and over as of Jan. 1, 1999.

Ronen told The CJN prior to his departure for the Claims Conference meeting that he believes Canadian equivalents like Old Age Security, Canada Pension Plan and other government payouts will also be excluded from calculating incomes.

Ronen said part of the package is targeted primarily at needy survivors.

"But this is compensation. [It's] intended to show some decency on the part of Germany to all survivors," he said, adding he'll put pressure on the Conference to get Germany to compensate all eligible survivors, regardless of income.

The other group includes survivors who spent the war years in camps that were not in the original compensation agreement.

Survivors who were incarcerated in special camps in Austria; in forced labor camps on the Austro-Hungarian border; or in forced military labor battalions for Hungarian Jews on the Ukrainian front will now also be eligible to receive compensation.

An estimated 3,000 survivors worldwide fall into this category. According to Kurt Herzstein of URO's Toronto office, many Canadians will be eligible under this provision.

The German government will spend $25 million a year on pensions for these 7,500 survivors.

The most recent round of negotiations, which began in August 1997, stemmed from changes sought for those previously ineligible under Article 2 of the so-called Hardship Fund.

The Article 2 Fund criteria include a minimum of six months' imprisonment in a concentration camp, 18 months in a ghetto, or 18 months in hiding in "inhumane" conditions.

However, not all such sites were included in the original agreement.

Congress says the new package, although laudable in intent, contains much inequity.

"They're looking at reported incomes, not assets," Ronen explained. "That's not fair. There are many needy survivors who would still not qualify [under the terms]."

Ronen said the Canadian delegation will also raise its voice in an effort to accelerate claims.

"Survivors are anxious and angry and justifiably upset. Most of that is directed at the Claims Conference. [Emotions] are wrongly placed. It's the Germans who run the show," Ronen said.

Italian community strives to resolve tensions

BY RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ROME — Italy's small, ancient and highly diversified Jewish community has been so rocked recently by internal tensions over who is a Jew and what is Judaism that some fear it could be split apart.

The crisis pitted increasingly militant religious traditionalists against the non-observant, and as such, mirrored trends evident throughout the Jewish world.

The 35,000-strong community, however, appears to have emerged from its policy-making congress this month with a renewed commitment to compromise that leaders hope will enable different religious trends and traditions to coexist under an umbrella of unity.

"Sometimes crises create their own antibodies," Tullia Zevi, the outgoing president of the Union of Italian Jewish Communities, said in an interview.

Francesco Spagnolo, director of a Jewish music study centre in Milan said, "There are too few of us to split up."

The quadrennial congress, which met here from June 21 to 23, elected a new governing board that is expected, at its July 13 meeting, to name Venice-based Amos Luzzatto to replace Zevi, who stepped down after an unprecedented four terms as president.

Luzzatto, editor of a Jewish scholarly review, appeals to a broad range of factions within the community.

He is a respected secular intellectual who, at the same time, has a profound knowledge of Jewish religious traditions and is descended from a prominent rabbinic family.

A focal point of the recent tensions among Italy's Jews was controversy over the conversion of young children of mixed marriages.

Italian Jewry is Orthodox. There are no Reform or Conservative congregations or practicing rabbis here. And, unlike the system of congregations in the United States, Italy, like other European countries, has a kehilah system. One joins the kehilah, or local community, not a congregation – and those not recognized as Jewish by the Orthodox rabbinate are excluded.

Just the same, most Italian Jews are not observant and even Orthodox Jews are traditionally highly acculturated, with a strong Italian identity. The rate of intermarriage is 50 percent or more.

Many intermarried families in Italy have raised their children as Jews, obtaining Orthodox conversions for them when they were infants or toddlers.

Last year, however, a rabbinical ruling decreed that small children could not be converted unless their non-Jewish mothers also were converted. Otherwise, they would be barred from attending Jewish schools.

After widespread debate and protests, the blanket ruling was relaxed to some extent, allowing each community with its rabbis to decide the issue on a case-by-case basis.

The conversion issue, however, reflected more widespread strains, based on mounting concern among rabbis and others that secular Jews had lost sight of what it meant to be Jewish.

"At root is a widespread and advanced loss of Jewish identity, in religious, family and social terms," Rabbi Giuseppe Laras, president of Italy's Rabbinical Assembly, told the Union's congress. Jewish continuity, he warned, was under threat.

"That which once seemed anomalous, illicit, dangerous and exceptional, today for many people no longer is so," he said.

In recent years, some younger people who returned to Orthodox observance became militant in criticizing Jews who were less stringent in their observance. These new Orthodox were in turn branded as "fundamentalists" by secular Jews.

Adding to the complications has been the Italian Jewish community's unique status in Europe, both for its antiquity and for the divergent elements within such small numbers.

Jews have lived in Rome for more than 2,000 years, making it the oldest continuous Jewish community outside the Holy Land.

"We lived in Rome long before Lubavitch existed and long before Polish Jews knew there was a Poland," said Franco Pavoncello, a board member of Rome's Jewish community.

Today, about 15,000 Jews live in Rome, and about 10,000 in Milan.

The rest live in a score of other towns and cities, mostly in northern Italy, in communities ranging from a small handful to about 1,000 people.

The Rome and Milan communities are comprised both of native Italian Jews and descendants of Jews expelled from Spain in 1492 – as well as immigrants who have arrived during the past 30 years.

One-third to one-half of Rome's Jews are Libyan Jews who fled after bloody anti-Jewish riots in 1967 following the Six-Day War. The Milan Jewish community consists of recent arrivals from more than two dozen countries, with the biggest immigrant group from Iran.

Many of these Jews maintain their own rites and often highly Orthodox lifestyles, which are quite different from the assimilated lifestyles of most Italian Jews.

This, too, has been a cause of friction.

Some Italian Jews have expressed the fear that the historic character of their community, with its tradition of integration, is under siege.

In an article published in April, the man who will soon head Italian Jewry made clear he felt that Italian Jews must learn to coexist in a flexible unity.

"There should be a dialogue among everyone," Luzzato wrote in a Jewish magazine. He appealed for a situation "where the rabbinate is not divided into opposing Orthodox and liberal, but is one sole entity, and is, with this, quite flexible."

The community, too, he wrote, should be one all-encompassing entity that will welcome "Jews who belong to the 'Orthodox' as well as 'non-Orthodox' currents, as long as halachic norms are respected."

Brothers create 'aggressive surf punk' band

By STACEY STEIN
Student Intern

TORONTO — Working professionally with a sibling might be a recipe for disaster for some people.

But in the case of bandmates Jason and Daniel Green, sibling tension is kept in check by their larger vision – Adam's Curse, a band the Green brothers started up three years ago.

Although Jason Green admits to some occasional tension between them, he says the two don't let the personal interfere with the professional.

"When you're forming a band with your sibling, you're always going to run into sibling friction," he says. "We have disagreements and most of the time we don't really see eye-to-eye on the little things, but we agree on the big concept, and we put aside our differences for the larger goal."

Jason, 29, and Daniel, 27, conceived the idea for the band together.

"We wanted to form a more aggressive band with a combination of punk and techno," says Jason. The brothers then recruited band members Daniel Maletich (lead guitar, vocals, songwriting, lyrics), Bret Ootes (DJ, vocals, lyrics) and Terry Riddel (drums). The final result: an "aggressive surf punk" band that has been steadily picking up momentum since its inception.

The band released a self-titled independent CD in April, and has been receiving airplay in England, Poland, Latvia, the Netherlands, Germany, Sweden and the United States, among other countries. Two of their songs, j and d and Under Suspicion, are also featured on the soundtrack of the film The Contract, which premiered at the 1998 Cannes Film Festival.

Although the past three years have been marked by several successes, the band isn't rushing to sign onto a label.

It's the old musician's dilemma – while signing onto a label means more money and more visibility, it also means signing off your independence and autonomy, according to the Greens.

"We're interested in getting our stuff out to a larger audience, but we want to do that on our own terms," says Jason. "We would talk to record companies, but they would need to understand that artistically we would have to control everything and that's not something that we're willing to compromise."

However, he is confident that the band is strong enough to stay independent.

"If a record company were to step into the picture, they would have to offer something really spectacular for us to actually go and sign on the dotted line," he says. "Because when you sign on the dotted line, you sign away part of your publishing and [when] the publishing goes, you lose control of the big picture."

For now, the band is working with a promotional company called Music Media Network, which has helped the band expand into other countries. They're currently looking at breaking into Spain and South America.

Jason is also acting as the band's manager for now, but that might change. "When things get busy enough, then we'll bring in a management company," he says. "I would love to concentrate on the songwriting, and I find that managing the band takes a bit of time out of songwriting."

Adam's Curse's live presentation style sets them apart from most other bands. The idea of blending film and music in their live performances can be traced to Daniel, a graduate of Ryerson Polytechnic University's film studies program.

"We have a cross between music and film at all times," says Jason. "It's really a predominant theme in what we're trying to do." The band has incorporated some of Daniel's film footage into their performances.

"It's a great way for us to present to the audience two things we're interested in at the same time," he says.

As for the band's enigmatic name, the source is a William Butler Yeats poem that struck a chord with the band. In Adam's Curse, Yeats muses upon the difficulty of making beautiful sounds.

"The message to us is that our craft is as valuable and as worthwhile as any other craft," says Jason. "Whether you're a high-level businessperson or whatever else, is valid, but also being a musician and struggling as an artist is something that should be respected as well.

"It just triggered something inside us emotionally because we do work very hard; and I think there is a tendency in society to look at artists and musicians as people who just lie around, when really the amount of effort and work that goes into building up something like this is huge."

You can check out Adam's Curse on Music Media Network's Web page [www.musicmedianetwork.com]. The band's hotline number is 905-764-1790.

Guidebooks help plan exciting summer holidays

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

With summer having arrived, thoughts turn to vacations. The following guidebooks, published by Lonely Planet and distributed by Raincoast Books, may help you plan your trip.

London, Europe's largest city, is exceedingly wordly, and London lets you explore it with a minimum of fuss and bother.

Unpretentious and funky, Lisbon leaves a lasting impression, and with Lisbon in hand, it's hard to go wrong.

Vibrant and seething, Cairo quickens the pulse. Sit down with Cairo and be tantalized.

To the average traveller, Romania and its neighbor, Moldova, are virtually terra incognita. Find out about them in Romania & Moldova.

Italy never ceases to amaze, and Italy expands on the obvious.

Goa, the former Portuguese enclave in India, has it all: fine beaches, colorful markets and lovely scenery. Read all about it in Goa.

If you're adventurous and strapped for money, The Hitchhiker's Guide to Japan may well be for you.

Should you be driving in North America, don't leave home without National Geographic Road Atlas, a compendium of detailed maps of Canada, all 50 U.S. states and Mexico.

High in the Arctic, Nunavut — Canada's newest territory as of April 1999 — has much to offer intrepid tourists, as does The 1998 Nunavut Handbook.

Rugged, remote and beautiful, the Queen Charlotte Islands in British Columbia come alive in A Guide to the Queen Charlotte Islands.

Another archipelago of islands worth considering lie in the emerald seas of the Caribbean. Bahamas and the Turks & Caicos provide the highlights.

Iran, with the largest Jewish community in the Middle East outside Israel, is intriguing but is usually bypassed because of its militant Islamic regime. If you're prepared to overlook this, and the government grants you a visa, Iran may fit the bill.

LITERARY PASSAGE: ALFRED KAZIN

Last October, when American writer Alfred Kazin walked on stage at the Harbourfront International Authors Festival, it was with the aid of a metal walker. However, although he seemed frail of body, it was obvious from the moment he began reading from his latest book God And The American Writer that no one could accuse him of being frail of mind.

A distinguished literary critic and intellectual, Kazin died last month in his apartment on the Upper West Side of Manhattan at the age of 83. His death came 56 years after his literary debut with On Native Grounds, a critically acclaimed study of American literature published in 1942. During his long career he wrote another 12 nonfiction books, including New York Jew and A Walker in the City, a keenly- observed study of Jewish immigrant life in New York City.

Alfred Kazin's "great gift was to write about novelists with the lyricism of a novelist," said his son Michael Kazin, a professor of history at American University. "He never stopped loving the writers he began loving."

In God And The American Writer, Kazin focused on a variety of 19th-century and early 20th-century literary figures such as Herman Melville, Emily Dickenson, Walt Whitman, Harriet Beecher Stowe and William Faulkner, showing how religion and morality played a far more intense role in literary discourse back then than they do today.

In the last year of his life Kazin was reportedly working on a related study involving the works of American Jewish authors in particular. If it is ever published posthumously either in whole or in part, it is certain to be a fascinating addition to an impressive and influential oeuvre.

In the Spotlight: Ellen Seligman, the editorial director for fiction at the pre-eminent Canadian publishing house McClelland and Stewart, recently won the Libris Award for Editor of the Year at the Canadian Booksellers Association convention at Roy Thomson Hall in Toronto.

Although the CBA gives out numerous awards every year, this was the first time it has so honored an editor. To add to Seligman's triumph, M&S won the prize for Publisher of the Year.

Seligman's name is less well known to readers, perhaps, than the names of the many outstanding authors whose books she edits. The list includes Margaret Atwood, Jane Urquhart, Margaret Gibson and Andre Alexis, whose recent novel Childhood has won considerable acclaim.

Among the projects Seligman is currently engaged in is Handwriting, a book of new poems by Michael Ondaatje, his first since 1984.

She is also editing "a collection of short fiction by one of the most exciting new literary voices I've read in a long time. The stories are fantastic, actually."

She is referring to Montreal writer Elyse Gasco, who came to her attention two years ago upon winning a $10,000 Journey prize for her short story Can You Wave Bye-Bye, Baby? Gasco, who incidentally is Jewish, writes on the themes of the "often-intricate relationship between parent and child, adopted children and adoptive mothers," Seligman notes.

TORONTO — An exhibition of paintings by Hugh Sinclair is currently running at Gate 403, 403 Roncesvales Ave.

Described as "abstract expressionism", the 29 pieces are mostly around four feet by three feet, acrylic on canvas or acrylic on paper.

In abstract expressionism, Sinclair has found the art-form that attracts him the most, for it combined the elements with which he is most familiar, namely: form, color and texture. It enabled him to explore the use of those elements in the creation of mood, movement and strength.

Sinclair's exhibition runs until August 3 and is open until 5 p.m. on weekdays and all day on weekends.

The 37th annual Toronto Outdoor Art Exhibition runs at Toronto City Hall from July 10 to July 12.

Over 100,000 people are expected to attend.

Valley Song an elegant rebuke to apartheid

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — As a teenager in South Africa, Janese Kane didn't realize the harm being done by apartheid.

Time has come full circle, though, and Kane, a resident of Toronto for more than 30 years, has produced Valley Song, by South African playwright Athol Fugard, whose plays are an eloquent rebuke to apartheid.

What makes Kane jubilant, is that Valley Song, produced at Ford Studio Theatre in April by New Globe Theatre, of which she is artistic producer, has swept five Dora awards in the independent theatre category.

"I lost my voice I was screaming so loud when the awards were announced," she says.

She says candidly "that people don't go into theatre to make money."

Even Valley Song lost money after 37 performances, seven of them matinees for students and seniors.

Janese Kane

But the ins and outs of the business world don't phase Kane, who came to Canada when she was 18. After years as a performer in theatre, film and TV, she founded the Gibson Girl placement agency but recently decided to go back to the theatre.

Among the plays she has put on are Shayna Maidel and Sight Unseen.

Since the Dora awards, Kane has plunged into A Fringe Festival play, This Hotel, a co-production with the smaller Bananafish Company.

This Hotel, a surreal love story, was written by the Jewish actor, Alex Poch-Goldin, who appeared in Angels in America at Canadian Stage.

This Hotel is at the Gardiner Playhouse, 79A St. George St. from July 5 to July 12, at different times. Tickets are $8. For information call 534-5919.

"I am proud of my genuine lack of prejudice today," said Kane. "I'm glad that the laws in South Africa have been changed. As Valley Song illustrates, change is difficult to accept."

Among the awards garnered by Valley Song, were best performance by Les Carlson and Yanna McIntosh and best direction by Seana McKenna. It also won the prize as outstanding production.

It was the intense reaction of Kane's youngest daughter, Allison, in April 1996, to a production of Valley Song at the Toronto World Festival, featuring Athol Fugard himself, that convinced Kane to stage the play herself.

In preparation Kane visited the actual locale of Valley Song on a holiday with her family last year, met the people whom Fugard wrote about in a semi-autobiographical way, and talked to Fugard many times, in person, on the phone and by e-mail.

Kane is married to Dr. Nolan Kane, a cosmetic surgeon. They have another daughter Carolyn, 22, a student in fine arts at Concordia University. Allison, 19, is on a scholarship at New College, University of South Florida, Sarasota, and studies drama.

Kane, who is "past 50," served on Holy Blossom Temple's art committee.

San Diego is California's crown jewel

By LEWIS ERIC LACHTER
Special to The CJN

SAN DIEGO — California's crown jewel, San Diego, offers scenic splendor, innumerable sights to see and year-round weather (about 21C and sunny) that will delight you.

And throw in a very active Jewish community of over 70,000 in this sixth largest city in the United States.

There is a busy Jewish community centre (JCC) in the centrally located East County, a JCC in northern Encinitas and another one in La Jolla.

You will find lots of Judaic art in the area, two Anglo-Jewish newspapers and tons of great places to eat.

The Temple Beth Israel, the lovely old synagogue is part of the fascinating Heritage Park area near Old Town. Services are no longer conducted in the shul, but it is open free to visitors.

The three-hectare Heritage Park is dedicated to the preservation of San Diego's Victorian architecture. In addition to Beth Israel, you can visit an antique store, and a doll shop with a huge variety of dolls and costumes that will astound you. The park is a must for architecture lovers.

Balboa Park's over 400 hectares take some major time to cover, but it is well worth it. You'll see lovely trees, flowers and then come to the world-famous San Diego Zoo. The zoo occupies 40 hectares of the park. If you are interested in an amazing variety of animals, don't miss this sight.

Also in Balboa Park are the Museum of Man, Globe Theatre, San Diego Museum of Art and Model Railroad Museum for children of all ages. The place is so huge that you might want to start by stopping in at the visitors centre to get maps and answers to all your questions. By the way, San Diego County boasts over 90 different museums and 115 kilometres of gorgeous beaches.

One of my favorite outings in San Diego is driving across the long, graceful Coronado Bay Bridge to the island of Coronado. You'll see lots of shops and restaurants when you exit the bridge, but keep going until you reach the fantastic Del Coronado Hotel. Built in 1888, the hotel and resort is in great shape. Room rates are high, but you can have a drink or a low-price lunch on the property, and enjoy one of the world's outstanding man-made wonders.

In the village of La Jolla you will find great shops, a wide variety of art galleries and restaurants. Stop in at the 70-year-old pink (yes, it is painted a warm pink) Valencia Hotel for breakfast, lunch or dinner. It's not cheap, but well worth the price of the meal. Or have a drink in the famous Whaling Bar with its whale-ivory carvings and harpoons on the wall. Or just walk through the lobby and admire the furnishings and the outdoor gardens.

La Jolla is also a centre of oceanographic and medical research. It is the home of the Scripps Institute of Oceanography, an aquarium and the Jonas Salk Institute, one of the world's leading biological research organizations.

Heading back to San Diego, if you still have time and energy, take in Sea World, Wild Animal park or Old Town State Park, a restoration of the city's original Spanish settlement (and it's free).

For more information, write to the San Diego Visitors Bureau, 401 B Street, Suite 1400, San Diego, CA 92101. For Jewish-related information, write the United Jewish Federation, 4797 Mercury St., San Diego, CA 92111.

San Diego is a year round place to visit. You'll need a car in order to get around, but be sure to bring your walking shoes too.

Skylight Theatre hosts 'Spanish Hamlet' tragi-comedy

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO —A two-hour tragi-comedy described as the "Spanish Hamlet" is the feature attraction this summer at Skylight Theatre in the Barry Zukerman Amphitheatre in Earl Bales Park.

A Polish King's son, Sigusmind, is held prisoner in a cave by his father's edict based on a prophecy that Sigusmind would become a tyrant. After a series of setbacks, Sigusmind eventually becomes a wise ruler of his people.

Life is a Dream by Pedro Calderon De La Barca runs at Skylight in previews beginning July 2 and from July 8 to Aug. 2.

The action takes place during a period of strife between Poland and Russia. The "Spanish Hamlet" designation comes because of a tongue-lashing which Sigusmind gives to his father at one point.

The lead role of Sigusmind is played by Daniel Kash, son of Maureen Forester and Eugene Kash. A veteran of Stratford Festival, Kash has just completed a leading role in The End of Civilization by George Walker in his six-play Suburban Motel cycle.

Guitar teacher helps students develop innate abilities

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — At 74, Eli Kassner still teaches at his own guitar academy and at the University of Toronto.

His schedule this year includes lecturing at an Amsterdam guitar festival in April, as well as teaching courses in Martinique and in Spain, where his daughter Danielle, also a guitarist, lives.

"I'm having fun. Why should I slow down?" he asks.

Kassner, the founder and artistic director of the Guitar Society of Toronto and the man who helped put classical guitar on the map in Canada, fell into his musical career by accident, he said recently in his Toronto home, surrounded by his artwork and musical memorabilia.

Growing up in an Orthodox Jewish family in Vienna, Kassner began his musical education on a quarter-sized violin his uncle bought him when he was four.

As a member of a synagogue choir, Kassner combined the interests of his father, a salesman and Jewish scholar, and his mother, a mezzo soprano who once had hopes of becoming an opera singer.

Although he disliked the violin, Kassner "fell in love with the guitar" after joining a Zionist youth group – Young Judaea – whose leader used to play and sing folk songs.

The group, and his father's tutelage in Hebrew language, saved Kassner from the Holocaust. In December 1939 Kassner, then 15, left Vienna on a middle-of-the-night train with several dozen Jewish teens bound for Palestine via Trieste, Italy. He took two suitcases and his guitar.

A shaliach from Palestine chose the group's biggest boys first to make the trip under the auspices of Youth Aliyah. Kassner, who is short in stature, was chosen because he was fluent in Hebrew, he recalls. His parents and a sister perished in the Holocaust.

Kassner remained in Israel until 1951, living on a succession of kibbutzim and serving in the Palmach.

Eventually he became a music and drama teacher at a youth village near Jerusalem.

"I went with the intention of studying painting and then returning, but for the first time in my life I felt like a free man, and so I decided after a few years I wanted to stay here."

An accomplished artist who had already begun to exhibit his work, Kassner took a job in a downtown music store to support himself and his young family.

His artwork, some dating back to his time in Israel, covers many walls in the home he shares with Ann, his English-born wife of over 30 years, his first marriage having ended in divorce.

The pictures feature recurring Jewish themes, although Kassner himself is not religious. In a defining moment in Trieste, he divested himself permanently of his tallit and tfillin.

Kassner's guitar career began when a customer heard him play a Bach gavotte and asked if he would give him lessons.

Kassner's childhood guitar lessons enabled him to progress on his own, an experience he claims is not unique. "At that time all guitarists were self-taught. There was no serious teaching going on anywhere in the world...practically every guitarist had to reinvent the art of guitar playing."

In 1959, after founding the Guitar Society two years earlier and having been invited to join the faculty of the Royal Conservatory of Music and the Faculty of Music at the University of Toronto, he attracted the attention of guitar master Andres Segovia, who invited Kassner to study with him in Spain.

The Guitar Society sponsored North America's first guitar festival, said Kassner. Over the years they sponsored numerous festivals, concerts and competitions. They also commissioned over 80 pieces of guitar music to help compensate for the dearth of contemporary guitar music.

Israel, Kassner noted, has an active guitar scene, producing "some very fine guitarists." He returned in 1989 for a 50-year reunion of his Youth Aliyah group.

In 1967, Kassner opened his own guitar academy. At one time, there were 500 students and 20 teachers. Now, Kassner, his wife Ann and four other teachers constitute the staff, working out of the second floor of the Kassners' home. Students can study classical, jazz or flamenco.

In the early '60s he played in the Stratford Festival stage orchestra, gave concerts and was heard on CBC radio and television, but he doesn't regret giving up his performing career to focus on teaching. "There comes a point where you can't do both. It was very difficult to make a living as a performer."

As a teacher, Kassner's philosophy is to help his students – among them internationally renowned guitarist Liona Boyd – develop their innate abilities. "I haven't tried to turn them into copies of myself."

A teacher's role, he says, is to inspire students and "maintain that inspiration until it becomes their own driving force, so they don't have to rely on me to inspire them."

Exercise viewed as essential for seniors' health

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — You should exercise more, not less, as you get older, says Beverley Burdeyney, a Toronto-based personal exercise coach.

"Health, vitality and long life are desirable goals and can be achieved with a commitment to oneself, in particular, a commitment to physical activity, which should be part of one's daily life."

Burdeyney, a senior who has lived and coped with spina bifida, a congenital defect of the spine, has many clients 50 and over.

She says having a normal, healthy lifestyle without fearing the aging process retards aging.

"Exercise helps you look and feel your best and allows you to achieve and maintain a healthier and more productive lifestyle. Fitness is a state of mind that affects your entire body," she says. "My motto is eat less and exercise more."

She says it has been proven that sensible nutrition along with exercise will lower your chances of having high blood pressure, cholesterol problems, diabetes, heart disease and obesity. It will also result in a reduction in osteoporosis and fractures, develop muscles for balance and stability, and minimize the pain of arthritis.

Beverley B. Burdeyney

Many habits of modern life do more to diminish health than improve it. When a problem occurs, such as back pain, people often turn to medications, which she cautions should be used for a very short time.

"The side effects of medication may cause other problems, whereas fitness helps prevent many of these problems before they occur."

Her formula for healthier aging incudes her three R's—rest, relaxation and relationships.

"And it is important to cultivate a sense of joy."

Sport activities, such as golf, can put stress on a particular part of the body. To minimize the risk of injuries, one must make time to learn about one's body and train it properly. She says that with a knowledgeable personal trainer who understands an aging body and recognizes your weak areas, a specific strengthening program can greatly improve your chances of remaining injury free while building stamina and a more flexible body.

"My motto is structure governs function. As a fitness coach, one of my first objectives is to help clients create their own dynamic central stability girdle, made up of the pelvis, abdomen and lower back." This, she says, can be compared to the foundation of a house. "If the foundation is strong and solid, then the building will be stable and stand erect."

Some basic stretch exercises she recommends are the pelvic tilt, single and double knees to the chest, head and neck stretch, and upper torso stretch. Regular walks, she says, are a crucial part of your health program.

With people living longer and spending more years in retirement, Burdeyney says, "retirement is only great if you have your health – mentally, physically and spiritually."

She recommends that you have a realistic "game plan" for your retirement. "If not, we know that early retirement can lead to boredom, unhappiness and even premature death. Life has to be lived. Life is a challenge. Life is a gift, so plan it well."

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I enjoy pickled herring, but can never find out how much fat or calories it contains.

A. One regular-sized piece of pickled herring contains 39 calories and 2.7 grams of fat. Herring is a fattier fish than many.

Q. Do you recommend taking a folic acid supplement prior to conception, and if so how much and how far in advance?

A. I would definitely recommend taking a folic acid supplement prior to conception, but this is probably something you should discuss with your doctor. Folic acid has been shown to reduce the incidence of neural tube defects. Normally, I would advocate trying to get nutrients from food before turning to a supplement. In the case of folic acid, however, this can be difficult to achieve.

I usually suggest a supplement of one milligram of folic acid daily starting approximately three months before trying to conceive. This could include 1½ cantaloupes along with 1¼ cups of spinach or broccoli, daily. You can see how this volume is quite a challenge to consume.

Q. We tend to barbecue a lot of hot dogs. What is the average calories and fat in a beef hot dog?

A. The fat and calories in a beef hot dog will vary greatly depending on the size and composition. An average small beef hot dog (57 grams) contains 180 calories and 16 grams of fat.

'Typical kibbutz' served as front for hidden munitions factory

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

REHOVOT — It looked like a typical kibbutz.

It had a dining hall, living quarters, a chicken coop, cow barn and vegetable garden. It even had a bakery and laundry, which served not only the kibbutz, but nearby communities as well, including Rek Maternity Hospital and the local British police force.

But the apparently normal scene was just a facade for the Ayalon Institute, whose real purpose was to produce ammunition and weapons for the struggle against the British rule over Palestine.

The sole purpose of the kibbutz, in fact, was to hide the munitions factory, which was built seven metres (three stories) underground, and was covered by four metres of dirt. The reason it had to be so deep was that the British had invented very effective mine detectors, which could find metals up to about two metres underground.

Entry to the secret factory was through the laundry and the bakery. In the laundry, for instance, one of the washing machines could be moved out of the way, to reveal a steep staircase down to the 250-square-metre plant.

The tennis court-sized plant held 25 pieces of machinery, smuggled out of Poland, and was staffed by 20 people, as well as eight munitions experts.

For security reasons, only those directly involved in the production of munitions knew what was going on, and worked in the laundry or bakery or in security. The rest of the kibbutz members went on with their daily lives, ignoring, as did the British, the many who came and went.

Members went on with daily lives

(A guide told the story of an unknowing laundry worker who suddenly was confronted with a group of people coming, apparently, out of the floor. She promptly, and understandably, fainted.)

The Palmach, and later the Haganah, got the blueprints for the Sten gun, a new kind of weapon. The Ayalon Institute made ammunition for those guns.

The institute was most active between December 1947 and April 1948, just before the state was established. After that, war materiel was imported from Czechoslovakia and Israel Military Industries took over the local production.

In 1987, the Ayalon Institute was declared a national site. In October 1987, the Ayalon Institute Museum was opened.

A visitor to the site begins the tour in the museum where there is a film describing the history of the institute. There are also exhibits that show the manufacturing process.

Guided tours of the site include the restored laundry and bakery. Tourists can watch the secret entrances being opened, and make their way down the steep steps to the plant.

Outside there is a compound filled with clotheslines hung with washing, just as it would have been in 1947.

The museum is between Nes Ziona and Rehovot, off the highway between Rehovot and Rishon Lezion.

Visiting hours are Sunday through Thursday, 8:30 to 4 p.m.; Friday, 8:30 to noon, and Saturday 9 am until 4 p.m.

When I was offered the chance to accompany the United Israel Appeal (UIA) Mission of Discovery that would take me to Israel for the 50th anniversary celebrations, my first thought was of all the difficulties I would have to overcome.

There was, however, one overriding reason to go: Israel was marking 50 years as a modern state. And that would never happen again.

I'm glad I went. The experience of visiting a country where being Jewish is natural, where the flag over government buildings has a Magen David, where problems of national concern are discussed in the language of the Bible, where keeping kosher is not much of a difficulty, and where people are celebrating its 50th birthday, is mind-boggling.

Rabbi Berel Wein, a noted historian and speaker, once described Israel as a place "where our grandfathers would have walked barefoot across Europe to get to." And, he added accurately, we take it for granted.

We take it so much for granted that even such a splendid occasion couldn't hide the very real problems that the country faces.

One expects to see horrific traffic jams on a two-day holiday (Israel marks Yom Hazikaron, memorial day, the day before Yom Ha'atzmaut). One is not even really surprised at heavy security every place.

Security at Ramat Gan stadium, where the major celebration was held, was more than heavy. Not only were attendees' purses and bags searched, but cameras were opened, partly taken apart, and a sample picture taken, just to make quite sure that they really were cameras.

The long lines that resulted gave people time to discuss seriously whether the cherry-picker overlooking the stadium was for the media, for security, for sharpshooters – or for picking cherries.

What I found painful was the bitter divide between the Orthodox and the secular. Few Haredim were visible at the various events, although the kippah srugah, the knitted yarmulke of the religious Zionists, was much in evidence.

The secular could be heard insisting there were no Orthodox at any of the celebrations, and the Orthodox were heard complaining that God was left out of the event.

The most publicized evidence of this hostility centred around the Batsheva Dancers' scheduled appearance at the Ramat Gam celebration.

The Batsheva Dancers, one of Israel's foremost dance companies, planned to perform a number in which they would strip to their underwear. The Orthodox objected vociferously, and after frenzied negotiations that continued through the early part of the program, the dancers were told that that dance was unacceptable. The group ostentatiously walked out of the stage area.

No one comes out very positively in the situation. Why did the Batsheva Dancers choose a dance that would be sure to offend a particular group? Why didn't the organizers realize what would happen? Why didn't people realize that such a performance might be inappropriate for what was, after all, an international event?

And why didn't the Orthodox, who mostly stayed away anyway, not realize that objecting so strongly would only make them appear foolish and divisive?

It seems almost trite to refer to the Arab-Israeli question, but that is, after all, one of the biggest difficulties Israel has had to deal with for over 50 years.

We were on a hilltop facing Har Choma, the proposed housing development that is one of the major reasons for the stagnation of the peace process. The two solitudes, Arab activist and right-wing settler, came together – physically if not spiritually.

The Arab, a post-graduate chemistry student at the Hebrew University, spoke bitterly about the humiliation of being searched every time he crossed a Jewish security barricade.

"Why is it acceptable for the Israelis to complain that they need more room for housing, but not for us? My family has lived here for generations," he said.

The settler countered that nobody questioned the Arabs' right to live in Israel, but that Israelis need to feel they won't be in physical danger, in the land promised to them in the Bible.

Ironically, the only point of agreement between the two was their opinion of Yasser Arafat. The settler insisted that he didn't trust the Palestinian leader. The Palestinian shot back, "Who said I do?"

The saddest moment was when the settler, responding to a question from one of the mission participants, said that even if the Arabs fulfilled every promise made during the peace process, he would not trust them. To which the Palestinian, obviously not surprised, asked, "So why should we make any effort at all?"

That is not to say that there were no positive experiences. I was struck by the fact that at the official two minutes of remembrance on Yom Hazikaron when the shrill scream of the air raid sirens pierced the Israeli air, everything went from the cacophany of the regular city life to absolute stillness.

Everything stopped – the buses, the cars, people walking. People got out of their cars to stand in silent respect, others left their offices and shops. The most haunting had to be the young people, obviously either close to army age or just past it, standing with eyes closed, heads dow and fingers nervously twisting.

Other things struck me: the blue jackets of participants of the March of the Living; the leader of the Mission of Discovery blessing his daughter on Friday night; the feeling of camaraderie; Yad Lakashish, a senior citizens centre sponsored by Keren Hayesod; the dinner at Darna Moroccan restaurant, where all the furnishings were brought from Morocco; the Russian olim at Ben-Gurion airport, apprehensively facing their new lives.

Most of all, knowing that through UIA, we in the Diaspora can play a very real role in the exciting adventure that is Israel.

Oilers take Henrich in first round of draft

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Toronto-area teenager Michael Henrich has taken an important step en route to joining a rather exclusive – some would call it "tiny" – club of Jewish players in the National Hockey League.

Henrich was drafted in the first round, 13th overall, by the Edmonton Oilers, making him the highest-drafted Jewish player ever.

If he sticks with the Oilers after training camp in September, he will become only the fifth Jewish player in the league. Others who have acknowledged their Jewish roots include Toronto's Mathieu Schneider, Florida's David Nemirovsky, Calgary's Ronnie Stern and Chicago's Steve Dubinsky.

A 6-foot-3, 190-pound right-winger, Henrich had been rated by NHL Central Scouting as the fifth best prospect in North America, but on draft day "his stock fell" somewhat, in the word of TSN commentator Bob McKenzie. With organizations drafting to fill a specific role, teams like Toronto passed on him to take a run at other prospects.

"I kind of anticipated I'd go a little earlier," Henrich admits, "but I didn't fit" with the other teams. "I was rated high, but obviously that meant nothing."

Henrich said he thought Nashville, with the third pick, or Toronto, with the eighth, might draft him, but regardless of the outcome, "it feels pretty good, although the time leading up to [the selection] was nerve-racking."

Michael Henrich

"Wherever you're drafted, you're the team's number 1 pick," he said.

Kevin Prendergast, Edmonton's director of player personnel, said the Oilers' had rated Henrich fourth overall, one behind Nikolai Antropov, the Leafs' top pick.

"Michael's a big, strong kid who can skate and score goals," he said.

Last year with the Barrie Colts, playing on a line with star centre Daniel Tkaczuk, Henrich bulged the twine with 41 goals and was considered an offensive threat. He won MVP honors for the losing team in the Bobby Orr-Don Cherry-coached Prospects Game at Maple Leaf Gardens.

With his size, Henrich has the potential to become that rare commodity coveted by NHL teams – a power forward who can score. Prendergast said that in Henrich's case, the Oilers will probably stick to their policy of allowing young players to return to junior hockey to develop.

"If he comes in and stands on his head, we'll consider [leaving him with the NHL team]... But it's a huge step going to the NHL."

Prendergast said Henrich has to continue to improve his skating and get quicker, since the NHL game is so fast.

That's not a knock against Henrich, who is only 18. It's only a question of his maturing and getting stronger, Prendergast added.

Henrich joins Michael Riesen, last year's first draft pick from Switzerland, as the Oilers' best young prospects on right wing, Prendergast said. "They have to come to camp and show they belong here. There are no free rides."

For Henrich, the amateur draft in Buffalo was the highlight of his hockey career. "When you're young, your dream is to be in the NHL. Now, I'm a step closer," he said.

Accompanied by his agents Mike Barnett and Eddie Mio of the IMG group, Henrich and other prospects travelled to Buffalo a couple of days before the draft. His parents, Jim and Frankie, along with 50 or 60 relatives, friends and well-wishers, comprised a pretty substantial Henrich cheering section.

After Henrich was drafted, McKenzie told a national television audience that the Thornhill native is one of the few Jewish players in the NHL and that he sees himself as a role model for other young Jews.

Henrich wouldn't have put it quite that way. "There are a lot of kids in hockey who are Jewish and whose parents want them to continue their educations and not go into sports where they can get beat up," he said. "I'd like to go out there and play and if people see me as a role model, that's great."

Last summer, Henrich was part of a high-powered lineup of Canadian athletes who won the gold medal in hockey at the Maccabiah Games in Israel. That team was coached by Jacques Demers of the Tampa Bay Lightning,who was impressed by Henrich's work ethic and intensity.

Prior to joining the Colts as a first-round pick in the Ontario Hockey League draft, Henrich starred for Wexford Raiders Midgets. He is also a former student at the Har Zion Hebrew School.

Once he's established in Edmonton, Henrich said, he would be glad to accept invitations from the Jewish community to participate in their events. One advantage of being drafted to the Alberta team is that he's only a few hours away from his aunt and uncle, Steve and Kim Henrich, who live in Calgary, he said.

"כשאני כבר לא מתביש לדבר עם אנשים שאני לא מכיר"; כשאני ישן כל הלילה - וקם בבקר יבש"; "כשאני עולה במדרגות - בלי להחזיק במעקה"; "כשאני יותר מלטף ת'יחתולה ופחות מושך לה בזנב"; "כשהצבע בזמן הציור, כבר לא בורח לי מהקוי"; "כשאני פחות אומר 'לא רוצה' ויותר שואל 'למה?'"; "כשאני מתחיל לאהוב יותר חבוקים ופחות נשוקים"; "כשאני נשאר, לפעמים, לישון אצל ילד שאני מכיר"; "כשאני לא רץ תכף להתלונן, כשמישהו צובט לי"; "כשאני מתחיל לאהוב את ל'יג בעומר יותר משאת תג-פורים"; "כשאני יודע שאבא ואמא אוהבים אותי, גם כשהם כועסים."

About families

Dear Susan,

I was the proud owner of a new car when a burglar decided to steal my airbags and stereo system. Getting this car was a big deal, because after considerable internal struggle, I gave myself permission to buy a luxury car. I now have second thoughts about the wisdom of the decision. Was I wrong to indulge myself, and how can I feel safe again?

Dear Reader,

Being the victim of theft is wrenching enough, but being victimized so shortly after making such a difficult purchase decision is doubly upsetting. Let's deal with each of your issues in turn.

We tend to believe we somehow control everything that happens to us. It is the root of all superstition, and it is most evident when something bad happens after we make a decision about which we feel somewhat guilty or ambivalent.

It is altogether human to feel that being burglarized was somehow the result your having made a bad decision, or that you are being punished for indulging yourself.

It is normal, but it is also completely wrong. Because expensive cars get into fewer accidents, parts for them can be valuable. Thieves therefore burglarize cars like yours to sell the parts to repair shops at a premium. Their decision to burglarize your car had nothing to do with your decision to buy it.

As for your safety concerns, a theft is a violation and it is natural as a result to see the world as more dangerous than it really is. Any victim of theft will feel a heightened sense of insecurity. The world is no more dangerous than before the burglary, but it certainly feels as if it is.

There are some practical steps you can take to safeguard your car. You may want to ask your dealer about available security features. Get an alarm system and keep the volume turned up. Leave your car in a locked garage if possible, and try to park in secure places. You may also want to speak with neighbors and local police about how you can protect yourself against crime in your community.

This is all useful, but it is still natural to feel more fearful now. As long as you understand the source of your feelings, you can protect yourself against becoming overwhelmed by them. Your guilt and fears will dissipate with time.

In the meantime, enjoy your new car.

Susan Leventhal is a family, marital and individual therapist, who has been practising for more than 19 years.

MAKING A POINT IN KNESSET

This progression of photos shows an emotional Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu as he responds to a heckler last week in the Knesset during his first address on the peace process in almost eight months. Alleged war criminal named

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A St. Catharines man is facing deportation for allegedly lying to Canadian authorities about his membership in the Austrian Nazi party and in two stormtroop units.

Ludwig Nebel, 88, is alleged to have commanded troops that imprisoned between 200 and 250 Jewish civilians in a barn in Stanislau, Poland and to have turned over the prisoners to the Gestapo the next day. "It is highly probable that these civilians were sent to their deaths in Belzec death camp," government authorities allege.

According to documents released last week by the Ministry of Citizenship and Immigration, Nebel was a gendarme/police officer in Austria when he joined the Nazi Party and the stormtroop Sturmabteilung (SA) on Dec. 1, 1933. At the time membership in those organizations was illegal. On January 1, 1938, Nebel resigned from the SA and joined the Allgemeine-SS, again when it was illegal to do so.

Nebel subsequently "collaborated with the Nazi occupation forces by volunteering for and obtaining the positions of gendarmerie-hauptmannschaftsfuhrer (lieutenant) first in Warsaw and commencing September 1941, in the Stanislau District of Galicia, remaining in this post until 1944.

"While gendarmerie-hauptmannschaftsfuhrer in Stanislau, [Nebel] commanded a 'resettlement action' in the town of Sambor in the Drohobycz District of Galicia" during which the Jewish civilians were imprisoned and turned over to the Gestapo.

Federal authorities allege Nebel, who is not a citizen of Canada, "failed to disclose his membership in the Nazi Party" and his collaboration with Nazi forces. By doing so, he averted further inquiries "which would have led to to his application [to come and remain in Canada] being denied."

Nebel is the 15th man to face deportation for allegedly lying about his wartime role in the Nazi genocide in Europe. He joins Josef Nemsila and Antanas Kenstavicius as alleged war criminals who moved to Canada but who never obtained Canadian citizenship. The

Israel will not draft yeshiva students

By GIL SEDAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — The Knesset last week defeated two bills aimed at imposing a military draft on haredi yeshiva students.

Military deferments for yeshiva students have become a highly charged issue in the deepening rift between Israel's secular and observant populations.

The deferments were first granted in the early 1950s under the government of David Ben-Gurion. At the time, it applied to some 500 yeshiva students. There are now some 28,000 men between the ages of 18 and 41 who have been granted exemptions after claiming that their only occupation is yeshiva studies.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, whose coalition depends on the support of the religious parties, had opposed the bills, one of which was submitted by opposition leader Ehud Barak.

The bills were defeated as a

New Funding Plan

CALGARY — A new formula for distributing money raised through the UJA campaign among local agencies has received mixed reviews from communal leaders.

The plan, approved last month, calls for a funding base of nearly $1.35 million for the next three years.

While the plan has been hailed as a step in the right direction, some say it falls short of meeting agencies' requests for stable funding.

Netanyahu Must Act

JERUSALEM — Two Israeli Cabinet members said it was time for Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to break the impasse in the Middle East peace process. In separate statements, Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai and Trade Minister Natan Sharansky said Netanyahu must decide on an American plan calling for Israel to withdraw from a further 13 percent of the West Bank.

Ties Deepening

JERUSALEM — On an official state visit to Israel, Turkish Foreign Minister Ismail Cem said Turkey has "no intention of sacrificing" its relations with Israel because of pressure from Arab states. The visit is intended to reflect the deepening ties between the two countries.

WORLD

Swiss Call For Boycott

BERN — A right-wing party in Switzerland has called for an immediate boycott of "American and Jewish goods, restaurants and travel destinations."

The request prompted a criminal investigation of Swiss Democratic party leader Rudolf Keller, who called for the boycott.

Shul Rededicated

MOSCOW — The mayor of Moscow, Yuri Luzhkov, joined hundreds of the city's Jews at last week's rededication of a synagogue that was bombed in May. The Marina Roscha Synagogue has been renovated with funds provided by the city of Moscow, local businessmen, foreign communities and hundreds of Muscovites "eager to help with their $2 or $3," according to Berel Lazar, the Lubavitch synagogue's rabbi.

Two people were injured in the presumed neo-Nazi attack, which caused an estimated $100,000 in damage.

Carlos Hires Papon Lawyer

NEW YORK — Carlos, the international terrorist who attacked Jewish targets in the 1970s, has hired the lawyer who represented Vichy collaborator Maurice Papon in the former French official's recent trial.

Athletes Remembered

SYDNEY — Hundreds packed Sydney's Central Synagogue last week for a memorial service to mark the first anniversary of the death of four Australian athletes at last summer's Maccabiah Games.

Community leaders repeated their call for a full Knesset inquiry into the circumstances surrounding the collapse of the bridge leading into the Ramat Gan stadium during the opening ceremonies.

Will Recognize State

PARIS — French leaders plan to recognize a Palestinian state if one is declared at the end of the interim agreement period between Israel and the Palestinians, according to Ha'aretz correspondents. Ha'aretz said French President Jacques Chirac and Prime Minister Lionel Jospin have agreed to recognize Palestinian statehood in May 1999.

Death Threats Received

GENEVA — Officials at the Israeli Embassy in Switzerland are being targeted by death threats. Police said they would launch an investigation. Members of the Swiss Jewish community have feared an anti-Semitic backlash stemming from the impasse in negotiations between Swiss banks and international Jewish groups for a settlement of Holocaust-era claims.

Reform Rabbis Angry

NEW YORK — The Reform movement's Central Conference of American Rabbis sent Netanyahu a sharply worded letter "demanding" that his government remove proposed conversion legislation from the Knesset agenda.

Israel Honors Non-Jewish Poles

KRAKOW — The Israeli embassy in Warsaw has honored more than 20 non-Jewish Poles for their work to preserve and protect sites of Jewish heritage.

The individuals recognized, who live in towns and cities across the country, were honored for such actions as restoring and documenting abandoned Jewish cemeteries, writing books and pamphlets on local Jewish history, and working to establish Jewish museums.

Israel's ambassador to Poland, Yigal Antebi, handed out framed certificates of appreciation and books about Israel to the honorees at a ceremony here last week, at the conclusion of this city's annual Festival of Jewish Culture.

Among those honored was Janusz Makuch, who founded the Krakow festival in 1988.

But a recent incident showed another face of post-communist Poland. A new memorial to Jewish Holocaust victims in the Polish city of Rzeszow was defaced by anti-Semitic graffiti. City officials have begun to clean the monument.

In search of the 'perfect' Jewish mate

By STACEY STEIN

'If you sit around doing nothing, you're never going to meet anybody'

TORONTO — Mark Lowenstein (a pseudonym) says he has been on countless dates.

When you ask how many, he sits back in his chair and sighs. "A lot," he says.

Listing of Jewish services see page 16

Lowenstein, 36, knows the Jewish singles scene well. Although he has been in a happy relationship for several months, he has been through fix-ups, singles dances and Jewish dating services. He had 30 dates from one dating network alone, he says.

Lowenstein met his current girlfriend through the Jewish Singles Registry.

"It's easy to meet someone, but it's difficult to meet someone special," he says. "Unfortunately, you have to kiss a lot of frogs before finding a princess."

Lowenstein's experiences reflect those of other Jewish singles. Finding a compatible partner within your own culture can be a frustrating process, fraught with disappointment and heartache. There can also be added pressure – both self-imposed and from others – to marry and start a family.

But even though finding the right person can be a long and emotionally draining experience, those who are connected to the Jewish singles scene say it is important to stay positive.

In the Jewish singles scene, there are different kinds of activities for people with varied interests.

"The problem is that being Jewish in itself is not enough of a common bond," says Josh Morris, 38. He adds that going to the wrong event can make someone feel that they're somehow "outside the group of Jews" and they don't fit in.

"There are a lot of different groups," says Morris. "For example, if you're an artsy, well-read kind of cultural person, and you go to a Jewish party at the Berlin discotheque, you're probably not going to find what you want…but you may have something in common with Jews that you could meet another way."

Jewish singles events and services include dating networks that serve a Jewish clientele, such as the Jewish Singles Registry and Soulmates Worldwide Jewish Matchmakers. Or there are singles dances like the Darren, Mark and Ari Present parties, which target the younger crowd.

Some singles feel it is less threatening and more enjoyable to attend educational events such as lectures or Shabbat dinners featuring guest speakers, which offer a chance to meet people and learn more about Judaism or other subjects. Kolel: A centre for liberal Jewish learning offers these kinds of events.

Other events and groups include sports clubs for Jewish singles, and a group where singles convene to play board and card games (Games Jewish Singles Play, led by Mollie Rothman).

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

But dances and dating services are not for everyone. "At the dances, all it is, is the way you look. You can't really talk to a person," says Morris.

Dating services are particularly attractive to people who work long hours and don't have time to get out to events.

Ruth Friedman, owner of Bringing People Together, says that lawyers and other professionals turn to her because they don't have time to meet people.

Referring to some of her male clientele, she says, "They work from morning to night and they don't have the time to find the right girl, so they come to me and say, 'Here's your $450; find me a wife,' and I find them a wife."

Shayla Gunter, 31, has been active in the singles community for about eight to 10 years. She says that apathy and negativity are widespread in the Jewish singles community.

"A lot of people sit around and wait to be fixed up and then they complain that they're single," says Gunter. "If you sit around doing nothing, you're never going to meet anybody.

"If I had to name the one thing that is most detrimental to singles, it's that there's so much negativity out there," she says. Admitting that sometimes she's guilty of this herself, she says, "People go to events with scowls on their faces or act aloof."

Gunter says that she and one other girl from her group of university friends are the only ones who aren't married.

"We've said we've got to meet some single people so we won't feel so left out, because it does put big pressure on you when you see all of your friends getting married," she says.

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, director of Kolel, has been active in organizing cultural singles events for several years. She says Jewish culture is not conducive to being single.

"It's difficult to be single in a community that's very child and family centred," Rabbi Goldstein says. "Judaism is particularly family oriented. It's hard to do the holidays on your own. It makes it particularly lonely to be Jewish and single."

Morris says there's a lot of pressure for Jews to marry other Jews because of the community's fear of assimilation.

"There' a lot of pressure to keep the generation going," says Morris. "The Holocaust is also on people's minds and there's a saying about giving Hitler a victory in the bedroom that he didn't have in the concentration camps. When you hear that and it's on your mind, you feel this incredible heavy pressure to keep the Jewish people going and you don't even really know why."

But pressures to meet someone Jewish sometimes become less significant when Jewish singles can't meet anyone within their own culture.

"If you're not meeting anyone, that's where assimilation and intermarriage come from," says Rob Singer, owner of the Jewish Singles Registry in Toronto. "You'll then try other ways to meet and go to other outlets."

Hamilton native Jodi Miller, 28, has been living in Toronto for 2½ years. She is having trouble integrating into the Jewish community. She says she finds it hard to meet and make friends with other Jews, let alone forge an intimate relationship.

Miller, who describes herself as an "alternative" and "artsy" type of person, says, "Nobody does that much outreach for the people who aren't mainstream, and the people who are mainstream don't really need it."

Miller says she has not been successful in meeting Jewish people, and she now thinks that she should not limit herself to looking for a Jewish partner.

"If I met a nice guy and he wasn't Jewish, then I would date him because I'm lonely and I'm not sure right now if there is a Jewish guy out there for me," says Miller.

However, Miller says she's not sure whether she would marry a non-Jew.

"The thought of it kind of breaks my heart," she says. "But the other thought is that maybe that's my bashert, maybe that's just what's meant to be."

While these kinds of sentiments may be becoming more common, some singles point to the whole process as a learning experience and urge others not to give up.

"I used to always wonder when people used to say, 'You just know when you meet the right person,' and now I know," Lowenstein says.

From the editor's desk

A lightning rod

Israel, more specifically, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, catches most of the blame in the western media for the stalemate in the peace process. Editorial writers seldom restrain themselves when condemning the policies of the Netanyahu government, or conversely, when avoiding condemning the policies of the Palestinian Authority.

The fact that many editorial writers in Israel also severely criticize Netanyahu provides a sort of moral "cover" for western editorialists who appear to delight in writing one-sided and heavily unbalanced opinions against Israel.

Canadians are quite familiar with this editorial approach towards Israel as published, for example, in the pages of Canada's largest daily, the Toronto Star, or the national newspaper, the Globe and Mail. The CJN has, in the past, occasionally pointed out this phenomenon by actually dissecting unfair editorials or articles that have appeared in those publications.

Whether Netanyahu deserves to be criticized is not the issue. Even if we assume, for argument's sake, that some criticism is justified, the lack of criticism by the western media of the Palestinian leadership is glaring.

A case in point occurred merely two weeks ago.

The subject was Jerusalem. Israel had decided to expand Jerusalem's municipal boundaries. The merits of that decision are still being hotly debated among Israelis, let alone among Palestinians. To many Israelis the decision seemed less a political statement about the future of Jerusalem than an attempt to increase the city's municipal tax base, or as some have also alleged, an attempt to ease the way for commercial and residential developers through the regulatory red tape maze.

Yasser Arafat's response however, was outrageous, a clear violation of his commitment to refrain from expressing "hostile propaganda against Israel." Consider the following excerpt of an interview he gave to Al-Jezira television:

"Arafat: The issue of Jerusalem is not just a Palestinian issue. It is a Palestinian, Arab, Islamic and Christian issue.

Q: Can one also say that it is Jewish?

Arafat: No... they consider Hebron to be holier than Jerusalem.

Q: More than the Western Wall?

Arafat: More than the Western Wall ...until now, all the excavations... have failed to prove the location of the Temple... For the sake of Jerusalem, we are tightening our belts to save money for the struggle against this Satan, the Satan of money, the Satan of influence, the Satan of discord, the Satan of the robbery which the government is attempting to commit."

I have seen no editorial comment on this statement by the chairman of the PLO. And yet, such pronouncements go to the very heart of the peace process for Israelis: Arafat's reliability and the nature of the desire for peace on the part of Palestinians.

In discussing Israel, the subject of the peace process is a lightning rod that attracts such live, white-hot electricity that the ensuing discussions usually flare up, even among friends, into fiery storms of accusation and acrimony.

Is the PLO trustworthy? Is Arafat trustworthy? Is Netanyahu deliberately sabotaging the Oslo accords? Do not the accords deserve to be sabotaged? How much territorial concession to the Palestinians is too much? Isn't any territorial concession too much? And so on.

Each question is valid and splinters off into numerous other valid questions. But due to the frequently charged atmosphere of the discussion, these many splintered questions almost always evolve into an angry, emotional exchange of sharp-edged, opinionated shards that cut rather than inform.

The issue of religious pluralism notwithstanding, no subject has been written about more, analyzed more, debated more, or argued-over more in Israel than the peace process.

This is not surprising given the nature of political discourse in Israel, the fierce ideological loyalties that characterize virtually all political institutions there, and the fact that the subject of the peace process does indeed deal with, in the words of Dennis Prager, ultimate issues.

But even midst the different ideologies and the sharp-tongued, divisive debating, two principles are acknowledged as being widely agreed upon by the vast majority of Israelis:

- The peace process must not end.
- But it must lead to security for Israel, even as it leads to self-government for the Palestinians.

Of course, more questions fall out from the second principle. For example: What constitutes true security? What is the maximum form of self-government for the Palestinians compatible with security for Israel? What is the minimum form of self-government acceptable to the Palestinians? Can Israel's maximum be reconciled with the Palestinians' minimum? And so on... again.

The questions are many and they are all valid.

We are all disappointed that the peace process is stagnating and appears to be at a potentially dangerous stalemate. Indeed, we all fear the spiral of distrust, accusation, recrimination, and the possibility of a descent into violence.

But anyone who condemns only Israel as being responsible for the stalemate simply ignores the truth. For any relationship to flourish, however, and especially one so tenuous as the foundering lines between Israelis and Palestinians, it must be built upon truth. MBD

Canada slammed for backing UN resolution

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canada is in danger of undermining its own credibility as a Mideast facilitator with its support of the July 7 resolution in the United Nations upgrading the status of the Palestinian delegation.

The accusation came last week from the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), which expressed its "disapproval" at Canada's support of the resolution.

The vote giving Palestinians additional rights at the UN violates the spirit of the Oslo accords, charged CIC national chair Brian Morris in a statement.

Canada was among 124 nations that supported the resolution giving the UN's Palestinian delegation additional privileges as an observer. Only the Pacific Ocean nations of Micronesia and the Marshall Islands joined the United States and Israel to oppose the resolution. Ten countries abstained.

The proposal, sponsored by 22 mostly Arab states, was introduced last December, but deferred for further study. It does not grant Palestinians voting rights or the power to nominate candidates for UN posts.

But it does allow the Palestinian delegation to participate in the General Assembly's sessions and debates, co-sponsor resolutions related to the Middle East, and occupy six seats in the General Assembly chamber in front of Switzerland and the Vatican, two states with observer status.

Canada voted for the resolution "because we believe that it will permit the Palestinian delegation to better participate in the work of the United Nations," Robert Fowler, Canada's ambassador to the UN, explained in a statement.

Canada's support of the resolution does not change its policy on Palestinian statehood, Fowler added. It's been Canada's position that statehood is a matter to be determined through direct, bilateral negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians.

The CIC feels Canada's traditional evenhandedness on the Middle East may now be compromised.

The Oslo accords are premised on Israel and the Palestinians working out their differences through direct, bilateral negotiations. By passing this resolution before the conclusion of those negotiations, the UN is in danger of "prejudging a critical dimension of the Olso process," the CIC says.

And by "rewarding" the Palestinians with new privileges, at a time when the Palestinian Authority has not lived up to provisions in the peace accords, the UN is sending the wrong signal and is "undermining" its ability to act constructively, the CIC adds.

In a statement, B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) president Dr. Lawrence Hart said his organization is "very disappointed" with the resolution.

"In conferring these privileges, the UN has once again made clear the outcome which it seeks to the peace process and its commitment to undermine the principle of bilateral negotiations as stipulated in the Oslo accords," BBC added.

In Israel, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said of the resolution: "They achieved certain improvements, which are far from what they had wanted."

Israel's ambassador to the United Nations, Dore Gold, called the resolution's passage an "empty success" for the Palestinians.

In last December's original draft, the Palestinians had pushed for an upgraded status closer to statehood.

Gold credited pressure from the United States and the European Union, which this time voted for the resolution, in curtailing some of the Palestinians' demands.

He stressed that the Palestinian delegation retains its status as an observer mission, which was first granted to the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) in 1974.

The PLO's status was changed in 1988 when the General Assembly voted to designate the PLO as "Palestine."

"There has been a change in small technicalities," Gold said, "and that's all."

Among the privileges the Palestinians had sought but did not get was the right to sponsor draft resolutions on their own.

Yachad allows young abled, disabled to mix and mingle

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Don't call Shoshie Lockshin a Yachad volunteer. The 17-year-old Ulpanat Orot student is active in Yachad, a division of National Conference of Synagogue Youth (NCSY) that integrates developmentally disabled young people with their non-disabled counterparts.

Lockshin and Odelia Benabou – an OAC student at York Mills Collegiate Institute – are as much a part of the program as members with disabilities, explained Galya Ouanounou, Yachad's program coordinator, in an interview at her home.

Benabou, who learned of Yachad through NCSY's Hebrew Culture Club at her school, is Yachad's high school coordinator. "I was so impressed with what Yachad does, I thought I'd like to help out," she said.

For programs like barbeques, bowling, Chanukah parties and Shabbatons, there are usually 20 to 45 people, half of whom are disabled, said Ouanounou. University-age students act as advisers.

On Wednesday nights, a Jewish educational program is held at NCSY. A number of Lockshin's fellow students at Ulpana take part on a rotating basis in one-on-one or small group learning.

"We discuss holidays that are coming up," said Lockshin. "We might discuss a certain mitzvah together. Everyone's on really different levels.

"I get a lot out of it. I'm learning how to interact with different people. It increases one's sensitivity to all kinds of people. And you're also having a lot of fun. It's not just for [the developmentally disabled participants]. It's for you too. It can be a very enriching experience."

Adviser Shmuel Stern, a 21-year-old psychology student at York University, became involved with Yachad in preparation for a job as a camp counsellor for children with special needs.

At first he felt awkward around the disabled participants, but he soon found that "really they're just people like everyone else."

One of the reasons disabled members are so excited about the program, said Ouanounou, is that they want to have "regular" (non-disabled) friends.

Racheli Feinstat, 11, shyly admitted how much she likes Stern, and said that even if he has a girlfriend, they can still be friends. Racheli is in a class for developmentally delayed children at Wilshire Elementary School in Thornhill.

She is in the junior Yachad program, which began only in the past year. The more established senior program serves members from ages 16 to 35. NCSY itself is geared to high school students.

For the Feinstat family, Yachad plays a special role, explained Racheli's mother Dvorah. It is "a good social opportunity and link to Judaism," filling a gap created when an Orthodox student like Racheli attends public school with a majority of non-Orthodox peers. (Non-kosher parties, for example, pose a problem.)

Yachad provides a positive Jewish environment, noted Dvorah. Racheli is very enthusiastic about it, her mother said.

"More people should go," said Racheli.

Although Yachad, NCSY and the New York-based National Jewish Council for the Disabled (of which Yachad in the United States is a division) fall under the umbrella of the Orthodox Union, most of the people in Yachad are not Orthodox, said Ouanounou.

Yarchi Kallah planned

The three-day program of intensive Torah study is designed for women of all educational backgrounds, levels and ages.

Each day's study will consist of two sessions during which participants prepare source material in partnered (chavrutah) study. This is followed by a seminar led by Rabbanit Chana Henkin, founder and director of Nishmat, the Jerusalem Centre for Advanced Jewish Study for Women. All texts are provided in English and Hebrew.

This year's topic is Faith in a Time of Suffering: The Book of Daniel and Writings from The Holocaust.

On July 29, at Or Chaim, there will be a lecture for men and women on The Song of Songs.

"As interesting as the previous Yarchei Kallahs were, I think that this one is going to be the absolute best," Henkin says.

She founded Nishmat eight years ago as a centre for Jewish learning that placed no limits on women's study of Jewish texts.

Today, it has over 400 students including Russians and Ethiopians, studying from beginners to advanced levels.

The program will be held at Or Chaim Yeshiva, 159 Almore Dr., July 28 to 30.

For more information, call Emunah Women, 636-0036, Esther Sacknowitz, 789-4883 or Rebecca Rotenberg Nadler, 488-8502.

Auschwitz convent issue not dead yet: CJC

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jews must resist the efforts being made by supporters of Carmelite Nuns in Poland to restore a convent at Auschwitz. Jews must also resist attempts to prevent the removal of a cross from a nearby burial pit that contains the remains of Jewish victims.

These warnings came from Nate Leipciger, chair of the Canadian Jewish Congress' (CJC) Holocaust Remembrance Committee and a former inmate of Auschwitz-Birkenau. He visited the notorious camp in February with the March of the Living, and saw a sign demanding the relocation of the convent to the former camp.

"The Polish government and the Catholic Church are quite firm that this issue has been resolved. However, there are some groups that do not accept the relocation as a resolved issue," Leipciger's report said.

The convent was erected on the perimeter of the infamous camp in the early 1980s, and was the scene of protests by Jews in 1989. It was ordered moved by the Polish government upon an agreement with the World Jewish Congress (WJC) after a lengthy dispute between the WJC and the Carmelite Order.

Leipciger told the meeting that "a group known as the Defenders of the Friars and Sisters of Auschwitz have put up signs in Polish and English which read: 'We have entrusted this site of our sisters' and brothers' martyrdom to the care and prayers of the Carmelite Nuns. Let us pray for the return of the Carmelite Nuns to their convent that they had to leave. Allow them – at this very place – to say their prayers for reconciliation between the Jewish and Polish people for saving mankind from the threat of another tragedy.'"

Leipciger, who is the CJC delegate to the International Council on Auschwitz, also advised the meeting that the Carmelite Nuns have decided to transfer to the Polish government the property just outside the camp on which the former convent stood. He characterized this development as positive.

But still left unanswered was the question of when, and if, the State Museum of Auschwitz will be given ownership and jurisdiction over the property, he said.

This is important, he explained, because a cross and its accompanying 14 stations (corresponding to the number of stations along the route Jesus is said to have followed to Calvary) are still located at the site of a burial pit on the grounds of the former convent that includes the remains of many Jewish as well as Polish victims.

NOI leader criticized

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Spokespeople for the Anglican and United churches have added their voices to those criticizing Nation of Islam leader Don Muhammad for remarks they say encourage discord and bigotry.

"I was distressed to learn of anti-Semitic and homophobic statements recently attributed to Mr. Muhammad of the Nation of Islam (NOI) congregation of Toronto," said Right Rev. Joachim Fricker of the Anglican Church of Canada.

"Canadians are trying to build a society in which all of its members are accorded respect and dignity. Inflammatory remarks such as these can only serve to encourage the racists and bigots among us and strain relations between different groups in our community," said Rev. Fricker, who was speaking on behalf of Toronto Anglican bishops.

"We are saddened by comments attributed to a NOI minister," said United Church spokespeople Rev. Peter Wyatt and Rev. Bruce Gregersen in a joint statement. "We do not believe that any group should seek its place in our society by denigrating or defaming other groups. In particular, we deplore the assertions reportedly made by Don Muhammad that Jews enrich themselves through funding the wars of the nations and that it is doubtful whether six million Jews died in the Holocaust. Such statements fuel the fires of anti-Semitism and in doing so, they undermine the confidence and peace of Jewish people in Canada."

The comments came in the wake of a request by Canadian Jewish Congress that the churches address remarks reportedly made by Muhammad before 50 supporters in the NOI's new midtown mosque. Congress has also urged the Toronto police hate crimes unit to charge Muhammad with promoting hate.

Muhammad's speech was originally reported in NOW, a weekly news and entertainment publication. NOW reported that Muhammad questioned the Holocaust, said rich Jews promote wars to enrich themselves and suggested that gay TV star Ellen DeGeneres represents part of the danger facing black people.

Ominous warnings

The General Security Service of Israel (GSS), acronymically known in Israel as the Shin Bet, annually publishes an assessment of internal threats to the the country's security. Most of the document is not disclosed to the public. Indeed it is not even disclosed to the full cabinet, but rather only to the prime minister and to top security officials.

There are reports that this year for the first time ever, the GSS has issued a warning against the possibility of violence against individuals and public institutions at the hands of Jewish extremists.

Writing in Ha'aretz, Ze'ev Schiff noted starkly and ominously: "The GSS mentions a possibility that extremist groups within Israeli society are liable to engage in grave acts of violence, including the use of firearms. Armed clashes are liable to develop between extremist elements and the government of Israel, and also between various groups within Israel. The report is not alluding to a civil war, but rather the possibility of armed violence taking place within Israeli society. All of this is related to, or stems from, various developments in the diplomatic process and the rift within Israeli society that is liable to result from it."

Schiff's report of the GSS assessment cannot be dismissed as alarmist; although it must indeed be seen as terribly alarming.

The peace process, or in Schiff 's words, the "diplomatic process," must inevitably require further territorial compromise by Israel if it is to result in a true, long-lasting peace.

When it arrives, that day will be bittersweet for the entire people. It will stir hopes and anxieties in the deepest part of the national soul. For most, it will be a cause for celebration; for some it will be a cause for mourning. But for everyone, it will be a day that tests national values and the collective moral will to move forward as a free, democratic, united people towards a purpose and a destiny ordained by God, articulated by our ancient prophets and affirmed time and again by the heroic efforts of modern visionaries and idealistic pioneers.

When that historic day arrives, will the forces opposed to territorial compromise submit to the rule of law? Or will they seek exemption from the collective national will and from the law's reach. Will they claim allegiance only to a "higher" law, only to a "higher" authority?

We have already witnessed the horrible examples of individuals seeking such an exemption, previously unimaginable but now, sadly, no longer so.

Almost four years ago on the pavement of Tel Aviv on a Saturday night, Yigal Amir slaughtered the prime minister of Israel. Before him, there was Baruch Goldstein.

There are other examples, less extreme thus far, of this attitude of exemption. Threats have already been uttered by some people against any attempt to return settlements in the territories.

Schiff writes about it in the following way in his report in Ha'aretz: "The next withdrawal, more so than the previous withdrawals, is liable to be even more painful because it will cut away at the living flesh of the Israeli settlements. Some will become isolated and will be at risk in the event that the conflict with the Palestinians is not resolved. If the negotiations continue and the sides reach the permanent settlement phase, Israel will have to decide which settlements to uproot and transfer, or... to leave, in territory controlled by the Palestinians."

Then, there is the matter of Jerusalem. This, of course, will be the most difficult of all difficulties in the final negotiations.

"If a prime minister was once killed for this reason," Schiff notes, [to prevent an agreement with the Palestinians that includes territorial compromise], it seems fairly obvious that the danger is still with us, perhaps in an even more virulent strain. This is the background to the recent evaluation by the Shin Bet."

We must do our utmost, all of us in the Diaspora as well as in Israel to ensure that "the danger within us" never materializes.

Reader describes another incident

After reading Guest Voices (CJN, July 2), I was reminded of an incident on a crowded bus during the rush hour.

A man insisted on a free ride. He and the driver were arguing and the passengers became impatient. Another passenger produced a ticket. I heard him say to the driver, "You Jew."

As he passed me, I asked him why he called the driver a Jew. He looked at me and asked, "Are you one of them?"

My answer was, "I am proud to be one of them."

A man behind me told him to apologize. "This is a lady," he said.

I was grateful to have the freedom to maintain my dignity.

I was the only Jew in the bus and I had no hesitation to speak out.

Says Congress offers knee-jerk reaction

With a knee-jerk reaction (to statements made by the Nation of Islam), a spokesperson for the Canadian Jewish Congress has risen to the bait, with the usual verbal fertilizer about "being taken by surprise," hate crime legislation and "destroying important links fostered between Jews and blacks."

Ah, the joys of multiculturalism ... and the trials of unsolicited patrons of "visible and vulnerable" minority groups.

Beth Tzedec co-sponsored visit of Israeli veterans

Each year, a different synagogue co-sponsors the visit of disabled Israeli veterans, together with Beit Halochem Canada (CJN, June 25). This year's visit was co-sponsored by Beth Tzedec Synagogue which donated half of the funds for the visit and was responsible for working with Beit Halochem Canada in the planning and implementation of the two-week visit, as well as providing several host and co-host families and many volunteers.

It was a great honor and privilege to be the hosting synagogue this year and to be given the opportunity to spend two weeks with an incredible group of men.

I believe it is important to give kudos to Edy Braun. Braun is credited with discovering the article and posting it on the Internet. He was also the first to begin sending the article to Jewish organizations.

Were it not for Braun's efforts, the Jewish community would have never learned of the virulently anti-Semitic article in New Edition.

Feels anger against abuse of children and parents

Re: Guest Voices (CJN, July 2) by Sidura Ludwig.

I was very moved and upset by Ludwig's account of her experience witnessing an incident of child abuse on the subway. I commend her for her sensitivity and bravery in handling the situation.

As a retired social worker, mother, grandmother and concerned citizen, I am constantly observing incidents of child abuse in my daily routine in the city, in the supermarkets, on the streets, in the subway – everywhere. I rarely intervene because I am old and feel that it would be counter-productive to challenge someone's behavior.

But I feel very sad and very frustrated that I am so helpless and my heart bleeds for the children as well as the parents. It is not easy being a parent, especially if one is poor, unemployed, single, abused, which I am sure most of these abusive parents are. Our system certainly fails these people miserably. However I am heartened by the Ludwigs of this world who try to do something to help. Keep it up!

Seymour Mayne: a modernist bard

By TIBOR KRAUSZ

For Seymour Mayne, crossing the street used to be a risky business, and even today it continues to carry more than the usual hazard. Yet, it wasn't cars he had to fear most, but – of all things – an onslaught of rhymes, cadences and phrases. Come a poetic seizure, he might veer off the sidewalk and risk being run over. Now, with a notebook always at hand, he will carry the poem across the road, jot it down and be on his way again, safe and sound.

"Once a poem came at me, I didn't realize I was walking across the street until I saw a car bearing down on me. It was a choice of either completing the poem or saving my life. I decided to do the proper Jewish thing: save my life first and finish the poem afterwards. I may have lost a line or two, though," he laughs.

Mayne is one of Canada's pre-eminent contemporary Jewish poets, who also doubles as translator, editor and critic. Though he is still in his early 50s, his career spans four decades and his literary legacy contains over 40 volumes of verse and prose, including The Impossible Promised Land (1981), Children of Abel (1986), and The Song of Moses (1995). He has just published Dragon Trees, a chap-book of new poems, and he is poised to add another collection, Carbon Filter: Poems in Dedication, to his literary credits.

As an editor, Mayne's portfolio contains numerous translations and a dozen anthologies, including Essential Words (1985), a definitive anthology of Canadian Jewish poetry.

"Poetry, like bread, is for everyone," read the words in a poster on Mayne's office door at the University of Ottawa, where he has been a professor of literature since 1973. Hugging the walls in his office from floor to ceiling are book-laden shelves, with titles on English verse rubbing volumes of Jewish poetry and prose – ancient, medieval, modern.

This kaleidoscope of influences fits well into Mayne's melange of poetic themes. Mayne is your modernist bard of the great Jewish epic. No aspect of Jewish history and life seems to leave his creative nerve untouched. The patriarchs, the Judean Desert, the Great Synagogue of medieval Toledo, the use of male gender in references to God – you name it.

"To me [being Jewish] is just as natural as breathing, and just as writers from other backgrounds write about their experience, I write about my own. My experience includes the Torah, the Sabbath, the misplacing of my tallit in the Yom Kippur service," says Mayne, who sports a grizzled beard, has the delicate hands of a pen-wielder, and looks the part of litterateur to perfection: calm, collected, contemplative.

Yet he sees the sum of Jewish history as greater than its parts and professes to live out his Jewishness as a personal as well as a collective experience. His verse interlaces the scriptural past with the present, emphasizing a sense of ethno-religious continuity that resonates through the ages and finds an echo in Jewish lives today.

His Bible-inspired dramatic monologues find their sea legs in the cyclic patterns of Jewish life. Take the poem Down Here from The Song of Moses. The Israelites take to worshipping the Golden Calf "down here," even as Moses receives the Ten Commandments up on Mount Sinai. "We needed something to hold aloft against the desert night," justifies the narrator, himself a fallen, the people's choice of palpable Baal over the invisible God with contemporary implications written all over the lines.

In writing poetry, however, Mayne sets out to convey, not messages ("If you have a message, don't write poems. Send a telegraph."), but impressions, and lots. His style is the improvisation of design and Mayne exerts intense control over his verse. His poems' sustained kinetic energy has their images leap off the page, montaging the black-and-white two-dimensional world of words with the three-dimensional realm of sensations relayed in technicolor. Mayne attributes his penchant for vivid poetic imagery to his onetime dalliances with painting and drawing. That, and his background.

Seymour Mayne

Mayne's formative years were a petri dish of Montreal Jewish Canadiana, circa 1960. Born in 1944 to eastern European immigrant parents, he grew up in Montreal's predominantly Jewish Cartier neighborhood. The Yiddish he heard spoken everywhere, he says, had a melodic richness that filled him very early on with a restless desire to write. He wrote his first poem before his bar mitzvah, drawing on themes in his Haftorah from the Book of Jeremiah, and the pen-happy poet has knocked off "a poem or two" daily ever since. Mayne writes not for posterity but for immediate use.

"The key thing I hope to have achieved [as a poet] is to take the elements of my Jewish identity and religious life and point out that Judaism is not something exotic and mysterious. Even if you think and write Jewish, you need not feel ghettoized in content to remain part of the cultural mainstream."

Mayne is an impassioned apologist for Jewish literature – Jewish, not for its author, but for its content. Jewish literature should help anchor Diaspora Jews adrift in their heritage to their roots, acting as a line of defence against a perceived sea change of assimilation, Mayne contends.

"If more artists and writers were more literate as Jews, it would not only make their own art richer, but also perhaps help Jews understand themselves and the nature of their experience better through finding in poems or novels a reflection of their own concerns and struggles," he says.

Yet Mayne has the same concerns as his less Jewishly-conscious counterparts in the Diaspora. The increasing radicalization of Israeli politics is one. "In classic Zionist ideology, Israel is supposed, not only to represent a return to power from powerlessness, but also to act as the spiritual centre of the Jewish world. But for Israel to become the centre, it must do so for all Jews and must remain open to the plurality of visions in Judaism.

"I don't think Herzl or Ben-Gurion ever had in mind a time when we're asking the question not only who is a Jew but who will be a rabbi," he says.

Diversity enriches life, and in his own observance Mayne practises the plurality he preaches: he belongs to an egalitarian Conservative, a liberal Orthodox and a chassidic Orthodox synagogue. "But I don't like the labels," he asserts. "I don't believe I'd have to be exclusively one or the other, or that ritual observance is the only yardstick for measuring one's Jewish identity. There are other ethical dimensions that define the form and content of your life and are no less important in the full gamut of being a Jew than keeping the Sabbath."

While in Israel, not even the unobservant need justify being Jewish beyond living there, but in the Diaspora, Jews have to make an effort to stay ethnically afloat, he says. But the situation may not get as bad as some predict, he believes. "We Jews are surprising people because no sooner do we sound the alarm that doom is around the corner through assimilation and intermarriage than we change course. We're an inventive people and I hope that whatever is ahead for us will in the long run lead to a renewed interest in Judaism, not to further assimilation," he says.

Though he has many inspirations in the Diaspora, Mayne's own ultimate muse is Jerusalem, where he keeps returning as if home. Two years in Jerusalem starting in 1979, and Mayne emerged a changed poet: he roamed the city and taught, wrote, communed with the prophets of old, and thought. Out of that relationship with the City of David have evolved many of his most intimate eulogies and more than half of his poems over the past two decades.

"As Isaac Bashevis Singer said, the moment you step off the plane in Tel Aviv, you feel the need to write. Israel for me is a place where I can pick poems off the trees. And Jerusalem especially has this tremendous cultural and human energy, with thousands of stories to be told and being told there every day.

Partly because of his affinity to Jerusalem, Israeli critic Shmuel Shatal calls Mayne "the Canadian Jewish Israeli poet," placing his work within the context of contemporary Hebrew literature. Mayne has four selections of poems out in Hebrew, and his forthcoming fifth collection, City of the Hidden, translated by senior Israeli poet Moshe Dor, is slated to hit storeshelves in Israel later this year.

Besides Hebrew, Mayne's verse has been translated into Polish, Russian, Yiddish and a handful of other languages. He has in turn translated poetry by Jewish authors from Hebrew, Russian and Polish, and his renderings from the Yiddish of poems by Abraham Sutzkever, Rachel Korn and Melech Ravitch have fetched him an American Literary Translators Association Award.

But Mayne's efforts at propagating Jewish literature in Canada don't end at translations. He has also helped establish a series of periodicals (including Parchment, a national journal of contemporary Jewish writing) and printing presses in Vancouver, Montreal and Oakville to propagate the works of new talents and forgotten authors.

Opinions

Much ado about Weizman

By Shira Herzog in Toronto

What was it about President Ezer Weizman that rubbed Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu the wrong way two weeks ago? In the view of many on both the left and right, Weizman's blatant criticism of Netanyahu's handling of the peace talks with the Palestinians, and more importantly, his public call for early elections, crossed a red line both personally and professionally.

There has been no love lost between the two men for some time. On several occasions in the two years since Netanyahu's election, Weizman has been critical of the government's pace and positions on the peace issue. In one of his more colorful comments a few months ago, Weizman urged U.S. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright to "bang Netanyahu's and Arafat's heads together" in order to break the stalemate.

This time, Weizman felt betrayed after Netanyahu had promised an imminent statement on the redeployment in early June. Since then, Weizman said, nothing had happened, and to make matters worse, Netanyahu had not returned his phone calls. A few days before his public call for early elections, Weizman told a visiting delegation from the Labor party that the "hope has been removed from the peace process."

Like all Israeli presidents, Weizman has worked hard to earn the respect of all sectors. His support for peace with Israel's Arab neighbors has been consistent, dating back to the mid-'70s and the aftermath of the Yom Kippur War. Along with Moshe Dayan, he supported the Camp David accords, and he later resigned from the Begin government in protest over the lack of progress in the autonomy negotiations. While Weizman was elected president as the "Labor" candidate (presidential candidates are put forward by the parties and elected by the Knesset), his political career has been checkered, and has been marked by a commitment to the peace process rather than a consistent partisan position. In fact, his only cabinet posts were in the Begin government.

Indeed, in his first term as president, it was Weizman who urged the Rabin government to slow down the pace of talks with the Palestinians after the first wave of suicide bombings that caused the deaths of scores of Israelis. At the time, Rabin felt undermined by the president, and the Likud opposition supported Weizman's criticism of the elected government.

Some observers believe that Weizman is no more than a barometer of the people's knee-jerk, emotional reaction at any given moment, but others see his comments as a deeper reflection of the vox populi – the people's voice. After all, Weizman is an extremely popular president. He has gained enormous support through his consistent support of families who have lost loved ones in action or terrorist attacks, and has visited every family so affected during his term.

Weizman's comments should not be dismissed, since they probably do reflect an existing undercurrent in public opinion. But the more significant debate is over the role of the president vis-à-vis the executive branch – the prime minister and his government. Israel's president is officially the head of state, but the powers of the office are limited and the president is barred from intervening in political matters.

In the past, before direct elections of the prime minister were instituted, the president played a key role in the aftermath of a national election, when it was up to him to offer a chance at forming – and leading– a government to the leader of the party most likely to do so. With Labor and Likud running at a virtual draw in the 1980s, then president Chaim Herzog played a critical role in the formation of the two national unity governments. In the new system, the president's role is diminished, and Weizman has looked for other ways to maintain his influence and voice as a political alter-ego.

But even with limited powers, the moral sway of the office is substantive. At the height of the current controversy, former president Yitzhak Navon recalled his dilemma in 1982, when it was clear to him, after the Lebanon War, that prime minister Menachem Begin was no longer functioning. Navon hesitated to go public out of respect for Begin's privacy, but in retrospect, he isn't sure that he made the right decision. One year later, Begin ultimately resigned, but the country had been without a functioning prime minister for nearly a year.

Weizman is erratic and mercurial, and shoots from the hip. His outspoken, sometimes abrasive manner has often alienated Israeli and Jewish audiences. But the reaction this time was big because he actually did overstep accepted boundaries. Had Weizman refrained from calling for early elections, Netanyahu himself might not have been any more forgiving, but others, including voices in the opposition, would have been supportive. The call for early elections crossed a professional, if not constitutional line, thereby generating a negative reaction across the board.

Although the two men agreed to disagree in private in the future, the feud is far from over. Like so many situations in politics, the mix of personal pride and policy disagreements is potent and often damaging.

Survey and controversy

By Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

Most readers of this column have heard the famous figure of 52 percent for the mixed marriage rate of American Jews who married between 1985 and 1990. That ominous figure was derived from the data collected in the 1990 National Jewish Population Survey (NJPS) in the United States. It provided the impetus for a myriad of continuity programs throughout North American Jewish communities. American Jews were seemingly on the way to extinction.

After awhile, a number of scholars, led by sociologist Steven M. Cohen, protested that the figure was too high. They argued simply that the percentage was calculated for a population that already included a large number of people of partial Jewish descent, many of whom may have been totally assimilated and in fact not really Jews. Calculating a mixed marriage rate for such a group would inevitably yield a higher percentage. Cohen argued that focusing on people who were or identified themselves (not their ancestry) as Jews would yield an estimate of 41 percent – still high, but perhaps less threatening.

The debate among researchers spilled over into the pages of the popular Jewish press, and included some ad hominem articles in the pages of Moment magazine. Feelings were ruffled, and these tensions have not died down fully. Yet plans are moving forward to launch the new National Jewish Population Survey for the year 2000.

According to a report in the Forward, the total of the new survey project will be $3.6 million, and this is in American dollars! Now this figure is clearly a maximal one, used, I am sure, to help with fundraising. It includes far more than the field work costs of collecting the information from several thousand American Jews, chosen randomly. It includes, I presume, salaries and other infrastructural costs paid by the Council of Jewish Federations, sponsor of the survey. I am sure it includes consulting costs of years of preparatory work before the survey and also years of analysis once the data are collected.

Still, any way you slice it, it is a fair piece of change for collecting data for one national survey and commissioning extensive analyses of the data. Is it worth it? If not, then the figure of $3.6 million risks being etched into the American Jewish psyche as strongly as the 52 percent figure was 10 years earlier. Only this time, it might signify waste, rather than possibly useful information.

In one sense, American Jews have little choice if they want national benchmark data about trends in Jewish life. The American census provides no useful information about Jews, unlike the situation in Canada where Jews are included in both the religious and ethnic origin questions. One problem for the Americans is that the sample size of a survey may be insufficient to capture the peculiar characteristics of Jewish communities in different cities or regions, or of different subgroups within a very diverse Jewish community.

The data will likely be of little use for planning purposes for most Jewish communities. In any case, these often sponsor their own local surveys. It is interesting to know how trends in Denver or Boston, for example, may compare with national trends. And patterns of geographic mobility from national data can illuminate emerging national problems (such as Jewish seniors moving to Florida). But most decisions about Jewish life will be made on the local level with mainly local data.

It is also not clear if the sampling design will lead to a sufficiently large subsample of some subgroups who may be of interest for all sorts of policy purposes: the ultra-Orthodox, Jewish immigrants from Israel or the Soviet Union, single parents, gays and lesbians, or "Jews by choice." It is within these sorts of subgroups that many challenging questions relating to the Jewish future can be addressed. And national surveys cannot yield the needed, often sensitive, information. (By the way, the Canadian census has similar limitations in the analysis of some of these cultural or lifestyle groups.)

One last point: The 1990 NJPS revealed some interesting differences between the American and Canadian Jewish communities. One was the way in which American analyses ignored the role of Jewish languages. I do not know if the 1990 survey questions at all about knowledge and use of Yiddish and Hebrew. But these items were not at all discussed in the initial publications and analyses of the American data. They were just not considered as particularly important. One hopes that the designers of the NJPS 2000 give the analysis of Jewish languages the attention it deserves.

You were strangers once in land of Egypt

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

I am about to celebrate a bar mitzvah of sorts. Thirteen years ago, it was my privilege to present the Canadian government with a report on how the admission of refugees to Canada could be made fairer, quicker and cheaper. The report received a goodly amount of publicity at the time, and not surprisingly some Jewish people let me know what they thought about it. Even now, so many years afterwards, I remember the shock that I experienced.

These people were Jews, members of the very people who for many decades had difficulty getting into Canada. Yet what I heard in their letters commenting on my report were the same words that others had used about us: "Don't let these people in. They don't fit in our country, they come with a foreign culture and they will take jobs away from good Canadians." At one time all Jews were "them," "the others," and now some of us apply the same epithets to refugees running for their lives. In those days it was the bureaucracy as much as the elected government that did the dirty work – by design, by neglect, by not caring. Unfortunately, these same sentiments exist today as well. Now it is people from Africa and Asia primarily who have difficulty getting their status approved. One man of Turkish background has been here for 10 years without having his case decided. His life meanwhile is in limbo, he cannot work, he cannot do the things that would be of benefit to this country, he is in effect a non-person living nowhere, but existing right next door nonetheless.

In a recent article in the magazine Refugee Update, the renowned refugee activist, Dr. Mary Jo Leddy, writes this about him: "There are hundreds, probably thousands of people like him – refugees who have not been rejected by Canada but who have not really been accepted. Refugees who have escaped the hellish realities of their own countries are nevertheless denied the possibility of living fully in Canada. Their lives are put on hold for years as they wait for their "landed" papers.

"Without these papers they cannot enrol in universities or colleges or take any significant training. Classified as "temporary" workers, they are placed at the bottom of any job application process. They cannot even start their own business or take out a bank loan. Many live in anguish knowing that they cannot bring their spouses or children to this country until they are "landed." The waiting can go on for years, and in the process, a whole underclass of people is being created – people separated from their families, vulnerable to exploitation by unscrupulous landlords or employers, young people without any future. The social cost of these people and for the country is enormous. Instead of helping to stand on their own and make a contribution to this country, we have hobbled these refugees, crippled their hope."

Prejudice is an illness that besets us, not the refugees. They have no choice, but we can adjust our habits, our speech and our practices to our true ideals. Says the Torah: "You shall love the stranger, for you were strangers once in the land of Egypt."

The Kirshner File

Anatomy of Germany's anti-Nazi movement

Fifty-four years ago in July, a powerful bomb ripped through Adolf Hitler's headquarters in East Prussia, killing and

By Sheldon Kirshner

maiming several of his colleagues but leaving him practically unscathed.

The attempted assassination, the 15th against Hitler since his accession to power in 1933, was the work of a loose alliance of conservative army officers and civilians. Their mailed fist was Claus Schenk von Stauffenberg, a top-ranking officer who planted the bomb.

The group to which he belonged was part of an amorphous resistance movement whose acolytes differed greatly in their social origins and political orientation.

During the formative years of National Socialism, the resistance was dominated by leftists. But as time went on, only three groups, composed mainly of conservatives and a smattering of socialists, were able to develop a strategy that posed a genuine threat to Hitler, claims Joachim Fest in Plotting Hitler's Death: The Story of the German Resistance (Fitzhenry & Whiteside), one of the best books on the subject.

These groups crystallized around Carl Goerdeler, the former mayor of Leipzig; the Kreisau Circle, led by Count Helmuth von Moltke; and elements in the armed forces. They attracted former trade union leaders, businessmen, lawyers, state bureaucrats and church officials, and enjoyed the tacit support of some important people, including Admiral Wilhelm Canaris, head of military intelligence.

Fest, an expert on Hitler and the Nazi era, ascribes their failure to a number of factors. The resistance was fractured into small circles and cells, and it lacked a widely acknowledged central figure whose authority and confidence could draw together all its strands.

The secret police was efficient and brutal, and Hitler had a psychological hold over the majority of Germans. By 1944, the masses had lost much of their faith in, and admiration of, Hitler. Yet they clung to the fatalistic belief that their destiny was bound up with his. As well, the shrill propaganda of the last months of the war, plus the fear of the advancing Red Army, drove them into Hitler's embrace.

There is more. The German penchant for deference to authority played a role, as did the perception that the resistance was betraying the fatherland in its hour of duress. And some Germans believed that the aristocratic members of the resistance were simply trying to win back their privileges, positions and influence.

The Allies, in Fest's words, "simply closed their eyes" to the resisters. If the Allies had even periodically encouraged them, a wedge might have been driven between the Nazi government and the population.

Fest claims that the resistance grew as it became clear that Hitler was leading Germany into armed conflict. Yet World War II was seen as an enormous setback to their cause. The will to resist appeared to evaporate under the impact of the deep, irrational feelings of loyalty that the outbreak of war usually arouses.

As for the failure of the July 1944 conspiracy to murder Hitler, Fest cites such factors as insufficient planning, blind trust in the chain of command and poor coordination among the participants. The bungled uprising not only lacked drive, but the staff officers who had planned it did not have proven commanders at their disposal.

It is also worth noting that not a single officer who had no prior knowledge of the 1944 plot decided to join the rebels on the spur of the moment. Criticism of Hitler and his government had been rampant in the army due to massacres of civilians and battlefield defeats in Eastern Europe. But when the crunch came, the silence was deafening.

The plotters, including Stauffenberg, were animated by a variety of motives. In their interrogations or in their testimony before the People's Court, they emphasized the elimination of civil rights, the arbitrary, dictatorial style of the government and the assault on the churches.

Some of the accused conspirators mentioned the persecution of the Jews as the primary motive for their opposition. One of them, Henning von Treskow, originally an admirer of National Socialism, had witnessed the mass shooting of Polish Jews, and this atrocity jolted him into the belated realization that the "excesses" of the Nazi regime were in fact a true expression of its evil nature.

As Fest suggests, a repugnance of anti-Semitism was not necessarily a reason for opposing Hitler. Arthur Nebe, a senior SS officer, found his way into resistance circles in the late 1930s. Yet later on, he commanded the Einsatzgruppe B, a mobile killing unit which decimated hundreds of thousands of Jews. Unfortunately, Fest does not elaborate upon Nebe's seemingly unfathomable convictions.

By Fest's reckoning, the rebels

Their dilemma, he writes, stemmed not only from the fact that Hitler shared their nationalism, but that for a while his achievements mirrored their desires. They glowed as Germany annexed Austria and triumphed over France, yet voiced fear of the future. Ulrich von Hassell, the former ambassador to Italy, was such a dissenter. "There is no doubt that if this system emerges victorious, Germany and Europe are headed for terrible times," he wrote in 1940. "But if Germany is defeated, the consequences are simply unimaginable."

Stauffenberg shared this ambivalence, as McGill University historian Peter Hoffmann observes in Stauffenberg: A Family History, 1905-1944 (Cambridge University Press), a competent account of one of the chief plotters.

Until about 1938, he approved of Hitler's anti-Semitic weltanschauung. One assumes that his support for these policies was tempered by his brother's marriage to Melitta Schiller, whose Russian Jewish grandfather had converted to Christianity at the age of 18.

Stauffenberg seems to have undergone a transformation in 1942, when he was informed of the systematic murder of Jews in the Soviet Union. Upon hearing this news from an officer who had served in the German embassy in Moscow, Stauffenberg said that such crimes were intolerable and that Hitler must be removed.

As the war lurched on, Stauffenberg's disgust with the regime deepened. " I am engaged in treason against the government," he declared. " But those people are committing treason against the country."

Arrested after the abysmal collapse of the 1944 plot, Stauffenberg and his fellow officers were mercilessly interrogated before being executed.

Judging by the comments of the SS officer who witnessed the interrogations, they were clearly disenchanted with the regime."The complete inner alienation from the ideas of National Socialism which characterized the men of the reactionary conspiratorial circle expresses itself above all in their position on the Jewish question," he wrote. "They cling to the liberal position of granting to the Jews in principle the same status as to every German."

In actuality, the brutalization of the Jews did not necessarily prick the conscience of the plotters. But, as Hoffmann intimates, it was a factor in their final and irrevocable disillusionment and breach with Nazi Germany.

Rabbinic Reflections

Kosher criticism has its place

By RABBI CHARLES FREUNDLICH

One of my favorite stories deals with the art of criticism. Once, a Jewish grandmother was walking hand-in-hand along the seashore with her 2-year-old grandson. The little boy was dressed in a sailor suit with hat and tie. Suddenly, the sky became cloudy and the waters became turbulent. A giant wave snatched the little boy from his grandmother and took him out to sea. The grandmother was terrified, but soon began to cry and pray, pleading with God to save her little grandson.

So passionately did she pray that the angels stirred and asked God to perform a miracle. The skies became blue, the water became calm and a slow wave brought the little boy back to shore. The grandmother's eyes filled with tears of joy; she grabbed the little boy and hugged him. Then she put him down and looked to the heavens and cried, "Where's his hat?"

It seems that even God can't please everyone and is subject to criticism. And criticism is very hurtful and makes a person feel small and rejected.

Yet the Torah mandates that we not hate our neighbor in our hearts, but rebuke our neighbor. Nor should we nurture any resentment or seek revenge, but rather love our neighbor as ourselves.

However, rebuking our neighbor and dispensing with resentment require us to criticize – to speak our hearts rather than bear a grudge.

How can we love our neighbor without hurting them with criticism?

It seems to me that "kosher criticism," the kind that the Torah requires, has two ingredients.

First, you must love the person to whom you offer criticism. Without love, criticism invites defensiveness and a negative reaction. Without love, all criticism is destructive. With love, criticism may be constructive and healthy.

Secondly, criticism must include a viable solution that can correct the situation. Criticizing an event that took place or a situation that is uncorrectable, is worthless and negative.'

The most negative of criticism is correcting a person in front of others – even when the person is wrong. No one wants to lose face, especially in public.

It's best not to offer criticism unless it's a major issue of life and death. Critical people create toxic relationships and perfectionist parents are the most toxic to their children.

The most loved people and the most effective parents are often those who are so accepting of their loved ones that there is little to criticize.

But if the situation calls for criticism it's best that it be "kosher" – offered with love and a practical solution.

Your neighbor's blood

By RABBI CHAIM STEINMETZ

On May 16 in Chicago, 15-year-old Christopher Sercye was shot twice in the chest while playing basketball.

Comparative Law

His friends brought him to a ramp 35 feet away from the hospital emergency room. The friends and two police officers asked the emergency room personnel to come out and bring Sercye inside. They refused, citing hospital policy that prevented them from leaving the facility. While precious time elapsed, the police went out to drag the dying boy inside. Sercye was pronounced dead an hour later.

What is astounding is that the emergency room personnel did not violate any laws! In most of the United States, there is no obligation to help someone in danger. (Chicago is now considering adopting a "good Samaritan" law, which would require bystanders to provide help to victims of crimes and accidents.)

In Jewish law, there is a biblical obligation to save lives. The biblical verse, "You may not stand idly by your neighbor's blood" (Leviticus 19:15), is understood by the Talmud to be an obligation to save people from danger (Sanhedrin 73a).

However, it is necessary to define the parameters of this obligation. Does the bystander have to endanger himself to save the victim? Does the bystander have to spend money to save the victim's life?

The Talmud (Bava Metzia 62a) discusses the case of two people who are travelling in the desert and only one of them has sufficient water to survive. Ben Petura is of the opinion that it is better that they divide the water and both die, rather than have one watch the death of the other. Rabbi Akiva is of the opinion that "your life comes first," that the owner of the water must save his life first, even if the other person will die. Rabbi Akiva's opinion has become the halachic consensus.

While it is clear that one may not sacrifice one's life to save the life of another, there is some debate as to whether there is an obligation to save lives when it will endanger the bystander. The Hagahot Maimoni (Rotzeach 1:14) is of the opinion that it is obligatory for the bystander to place himself in uncertain danger in order to save the victim from certain danger. Others argue that it is forbidden to do so, and that the principle of "your life comes first" applies to uncertain danger as well (Radvaz in Pitchei Teshuva YD 157:15).

Based on this opinion, some authorities forbid a donor to give a kidney to a dying patient if it will place the donor in some danger (Tzitz Eliezer 13:101; Minchat Yitzchak 6:103).

Rabbi Moshe Feinstein takes a middle point of view. It is not obligatory to place yourself in a situation of questionable danger to save another person's life; however, you may choose to take this risk in order to save a life. Therefore, he rules it is permitted to donate kidneys, even if there is some danger to the donor. (YD 2:174)

What about spending money? The Talmud (Sanhedrin 73a) requires the bystander to spend money in order to save lives. If the victim has money, he must repay those who save him (Rosh Sanhedrin 8:1). However, the bystander has an obligation to spend money even when the victim cannot repay.

The Chofetz Chaim rules that the bystander is obligated to spend all of his money (Ahavat Chesed 2:20). One reason he gives is that when the Rabbi Akiva states that "your life comes first," it implies that only your life comes first; your money does not.

Rabbi Yoseph Shalom Elyashev disagrees, and says that the bystander does not have to give more than one-fifth of his wealth to save a life (Quoted in Nishmat Avraham V, CM 426:1). He interprets Rabbi Akiva's statement differently, and argues that Jewish sources consider a loss of wealth as a partial "death." Therefore, the donor would not be obligated to impoverish himself to save the lives of others.

Christopher Sercye died while others stood by because there was no law obligating them to help him. Unlike American law, Halachah requires bystanders to expend time, money and effort to save someone in danger, and does not allow them to ignore someone who is 35 feet away.

The Arabs' dream palace

The Dream Palace of the Arabs*, by Fouad Ajami (Random House, $36)

In 1994, Naguib Manfouz, Egyptian Nobel laureate in literature, was paralyzed in his writing hand by a stab wound to his neck. The blow was struck by a religious extremist who opposed the elderly writer's liberal and secularist ideas.

When Israel invaded Lebanon in 1982 Khalil Hawl, a gifted but troubled poet committed suicide. The long years of bitter factional strife in his beloved country and the supremacy of Israel dashed any hopes he had for Lebanon's future.

In 1997, a young Jordanian soldier, opposed to peace with Israel opened fire on a group of young Israeli schoolgirls on a tourist trip to the Jordan Valley. He killed seven of them before his rifle jammed. A saddened King Hussein of Jordan apologized and made condolence calls on the bereaved families. But when a court sentenced the murderer to 25 years in prison, more than a thousand university students in Amman demonstrated on his behalf.

The author, a native of Lebanon and professor of Middle Eastern Studies at Johns Hopkins University, makes use of the incidents indicated above – and the creative work of a variety of Arab poets and writers – to present a personal journey into the kind of society – intellectual, political and social – that Arabs, such as himself, inherited after World War II.

Ajami is disappointed and despairing. He laments that the Arab intellectual class that at one time sought the establishment of democratic secular regimes and the assertion of western values have been overwhelmed by nationalistic fervor, religious messianism and political intransigence.

In four well-crafted essays the author describes how Arab dreams and visions, unrealistic expectations and poetic illusions were smashed against harsh external realities.

Such salient events as Israel's rout of the Arab armies in 1967, the rise of the rich and corrupt oil states of the Gulf in the '70s, '80s and '90s, the brutal dictatorships in Syria, Iraq, Lybia and Sudan and the spread of Muslim fundamentalism from Iran to Algeria spelled the end of pan-Arabic nationalism. The dream of an Arab renaissance collapsed in ruins.

Egypt, the largest and potentially the most promising of the Arab nations has gone downhill. "At the heart of Egyptian life there lies a terrible sense of disappointment. The pride of modern Egypt has been far greater than its accomplishments. For all the graces of this land and for all the long struggle of its modernizers, that gap between Egypt's sense of itself and its performance is impossible to ignore: the poverty of the underclass; the bleak political landscape that allows a military officer to monopolize political power and diminish all would-be rivals in the civil society; the sectarian strife between Muslim and Copt; state of its cultural and educational life."

In the book's final essay the author addresses the question of the Arab intellectual encounter with Zionism. Some recognize the need to make peace with Israel and even acknowledge the legitimacy of the Jewish claim to land. Most of the others, however, cling to their hatred of Israel "with something approaching desperation."

Understandably, the candid author is not popular in the Islamic world. But this work will interest anyone seeking a fuller understanding of the realities of modern Arab life.

Surfing through Europe

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Last week, we began our virtual tour of the Jewish Museums of Europe. If you still haven't satisfied your wanderlust, here are some more Jewish sites well worth a visit on the World Wide Web.

The Austrian Jewish Museum of Eisenstadt offers a generous site in both German and English [http://www.oejudmus.or.at/oejudmus/].

Housed within the museum is Samson Wertheimer's former private synagogue, one of the few synagogues in the German-speaking areas of Europe that was not destroyed on Kristallnacht or during the Holocaust.

According to the site, in 1921 the Jewish community of Eisenstadt was the only community under Jewish administration in the Republic of Austria. Two Jewish families live in Eisenstadt now.

While in Austria, you can also check out the Jüdisches Museum der Stadt Wien [http://www.jmw.at/] and the Jüdischen Museums Hohenems [http://www2.vol.at/jmh/]. These sites are in German only.

The Jewish Museum, London's Museum of Jewish Life maintains a large online exhibition about Yiddish Theatre in London. It traces the evolution of Yiddish theatre in London from the 1883 arrival of Jacob P. Adler and his Russian Jewish Operatic Company in 1883 through its heyday, decline and the present [http://www.ort.org/jewmusm/].

Stockholm's Judiska Museet [http://www.telemuseum.se/Stockholmsmuseer/Sthlmmus.eng.ijj.html#24] outlines the growth of the Jewish community starting in 1775, the year in which the first Swedish Jew, Aaron Isaac, was given permission to settle in Sweden.

Before you embark on any trip, real or virtual, make sure you pay a visit to the Jewish Museums Forum [http://www.jewishmuseums.com]. This is a marvelous site which has an extensive list of Jewish museums in the United States and worldwide. I was surprised to find out that there are dozens of travelling Jewish exhibits available for rental [http://www.jewishmuseums.com/jetssub.htm].

Here are two of them: Edward Serotta has created a photo exhibit about Sarajevo's Jews, describing how they turned their synagogue into one of the most effective aid agencies in the war-ravaged city. This exhibit can be rented for $2,000 plus shipping and insurance.

And the Jewish Theological Seminary's has created a fascinating travelling exhibit on The Jew As Other: A Century of English Caricature, 1730-1830 [http://www.jtsa.edu/library/exhib/jewoth/].

I also enjoyed issues of the Jewish Heritage Report [http://www.jewishmuseums.com/jhr.shtml]. I was intrigued by articles on such topics as the wall paintings that have been discovered in the former synagogue of Ziar nad Hronom in Central Slovakia or how city planning officials in Rangoon, Myanmar (Burma) have agreed not to relocate the city's only Jewish cemetery in order to construct a shopping centre on that site.

Ironically, the Jewish Museums Forum Internet site has lost its funding from The National Foundation for Jewish Culture [http://www.jewishculture.org]. Unless a new sponsor is found, the Forum Web site may not be in operation after July 31. That would be a great pity.

Next time, we conclude our European travels with journeys to Ireland, Lithuania and the Netherlands.

Catholic Church still unwilling to accept responsibility

By STANLEY TAUBE

The recent failure of the Vatican to condemn its wartime pope, Pius XII, means that the Roman Catholic Church is still unwilling to fully accept its moral failure during the Holocaust.

Guest Voices

Some writers have suggested that history is being too hard on that particular pope. For example, in the March 30 issue of Newsweek, columnist Kenneth L. Woodward ended his apologia for Pius XII by concluding: "It's time to lay off this pope."

Such articles conveniently focus on some positive actions that took place during the Holocaust. However, to properly assess the role of Pope Pius XII during the Nazi period in general, and during the Holocaust in particular, surely we must examine the extensive negative conduct of the pope as well as his positive acts.

After the end of World War I, and many years before his election as pope in 1939, Pius XII had been papal nuncio in Germany. He was present during the Communist upheavals in that country and he witnessed firsthand the anti-religious bias of Bolshevism. Accordingly, he developed strong sympathies towards right-wing regimes (such as those of Mussolini in Italy, Hitler in Germany and Franco in Spain) that were strongly anti-Communist. It was the old adage that "the enemy of my enemy is my friend."

Very early in the Nazi regime, which came to power on Jan. 30, 1933, the Vatican began bending over backwards to make an accommodation with Hitler. And Cardinal Eugenio Pacelli, as he was known before being elected pope, was at the forefront of these efforts. As early as March 1933, the Vatican reversed its earlier ban on Catholics becoming members of the Nazi party. On July 20, 1933, the Vatican signed a concordat with the Nazi government. This gave respectability and moral recognition to the Nazis at a time when the international community had grave doubts about Hitler and his movement. And all the while, the vestiges of democracy and decency were being destroyed in Germany – political parties, state and local governments, labor unions, the free press.

The Vatican was clearly trying to protect its own turf amidst the chaos. Cardinal Pacelli, who by this time was papal secretary of state, was essentially in charge of all dealings with the Nazis.

As the 1930s progressed, Nazi brutality and anti-Semitism increased dramatically, concentration camps were built, Jews were excluded from all facets of public life and lawlessness ran rampant in Germany. Yet throughout this period, very little dissent was heard from the Vatican. Cardinal Pacelli was principally involved in the Vatican's decision to provide mid-19th century birth records to the Nazis. Such records were not readily available elsewhere. This facilitated the murderous program of hunting down anyone who had even remote Jewish ancestry.

During the night of Nov. 9-10, 1938, the infamous Kristallnacht, when Jewish stores were looted, synagogues burned, and thousands of Jews arrested and sent to concentration camps, hardly a word of protest was heard from the Vatican.

On July 7, 1939, soon after he was elected pope, Pius XII ordered the lifting of the Vatican ban on the French Fascist movement, Action Française. He was willing to be silent as horrors were perpetrated, but he had no hesitation in actively promoting right-wing movements that were opposed to Communism.

Then, with the advent of war, the mass destruction of European Jewry accelerated rapidly. There is little doubt that the Vatican – and Pope Pius XII – were made aware early on of the extermination of the Jews. Catholic officers serving in the German army in Poland and Russia passed on the information to various bishops and officials in the Catholic hierarchy. They undoubtedly related it to the Vatican. Yet, there was virtual silence from the Vatican and from Pius XII. There were some very general statements about good conduct and morals, but nothing specific involving the brutal destruction of millions of Jews.

The pope preferred to play it safe. He was also obsessed with appearing neutral, since there were Catholics on both sides in the war. Even when over 1,000 Roman Jews were rounded up on Oct. 18, 1943, under the very eyes of the Vatican and sent to Auschwitz, Pius XII said nothing. It was a complete abdication of moral leadership by the Vatican, led by a weak pope.

However, in order to put Pius XII's role into full perspective, we have to ask – what could Pius XII have done? Some argue that if Pius XII had spoken up openly and forcefully in condemning Nazi atrocities, it would have made things worse for the Jews. But when six million Jews are being tortured, starved and gassed to death, how much worse could it have become for them?

Open Catholic opposition to the Holocaust might well have brought retribution to the Catholic Church by the Nazis. But where is it written that being decent and moral must be easy and without pain? Did Jesus not set the ultimate example for opposition to a cruel state?

Certainly, there were individual priests and bishops who spoke out against the Nazis. One example was Provost Bernhard Lichtenberg of Berlin, who paid for his brave actions with his life in 1943 while being transported to Dachau. And there were many individual efforts to help victims of Nazi brutality. However, these were generally the exceptions.

But imagine a public denunciation by the pope himself in 1942 or 1943 attacking the atrocities and threatening excommunication of the perpetrators! This would have sent shockwaves throughout the world. It would have given the lie to Nazi attempts to cover up the Holocaust. It would have stiffened the resolve of those opposed to Hitler and his regime. It would have encouraged many more non-Jews to help their Jewish brethren by providing refuge and other forms of assistance. It would have cast doubt in the minds of hundreds of thousands of Catholics in the Axis armed forces as to the conduct of the war.

It is not a question of whether Pope Pius XII could have had a profound effect. It is only a question of the magnitude of that effect.

Pope Pius XII failed in his most important role as pope – exerting the moral leadership of the Roman Catholic Church at a time of world crisis. If history is to be accurately dealt with and the horrors of the Holocaust never repeated, the actions of this pope must be strongly condemned.

Jewish singles programs, groups help to find your bashert

By STACEY STEIN
Student Intern

TORONTO — There are many services, programs and organizations available to help in the quest to find your bashert.

Dating Services

The Jewish Singles Registry, owned by Rob Singer – About 1,600 people have joined the registry since it was founded in 1992. For a fee, clients submit a profile and photo of themselves, which can be accessed by other registered members. Clients can also peruse Singer's database to find people they are interested in meeting. Singer says the registry yields about one engagement per month.

Evelyn Potok's Soulmates Worldwide Jewish Matchmakers – This is a dating service with a spiritual bent, Potok says. "I ask for God's assistance in matchmaking." The service, which she started about 10 years ago, has members in the United States and Israel as well as Canada. Clients fill out a profile of themselves, but do not submit photos. Potok's clientele is entered on a computer database through which she finds two singles she thinks are compatible. She then calls the female and if approval is given, she calls the man and hopes a date will be set up.

Bringing People Together, started by Ruth Friedman in 1990 – Friedman spends about an hour and a half interviewing each potential client. She asks them questions and shows them pictures of other people in her file system, which contains about 1,500 photos. If the person decides to join after the interview, a $450 fee allows the client to choose up to 26 people. Friedman's engagement rate is at least two per month, she says.

Singles Dances

Mark and Ari Present, started by Mark Brodkin and Ari Huber about 10 years ago – The organization, now run by Darren Budd, organizes Jewish singles parties at different venues in the city. Budd throws eight to 10 parties a year, with attendance between 1,200 and 1,400. The biggest and most well-attended event of the year is the Matzo Ball party, held on Christmas eve.

Meeting Through Sports

Sid Dorfman's Metro Toronto Sports – Activities are offered to bring together sports-oriented young people. In the summer, Dorfman organizes co-ed baseball teams, with about 300 people playing. The leagues are comprised mainly of singles, and Dorfman says the organization is "basically Jewish."

Earl Tucker's Adventure Network – This is another sports club catering to singles, with a focus on the Jewish community. The group is involved with outdoor adventure sports such as hiking, cycling and skiing. Tucker's group has attracted a diverse range of people, including participants from France and Israel.

Educational and other programs

Kolel: A centre for liberal Jewish learning – Kolel incorporates Jewish education into its singles programming. Kolel also hosts an annual dinner for singles on Dec. 24 that features a guest speaker. Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, director of Kolel, is starting a new series, planned for October – "a hip, Sunday night coffeehouse lecture series for young people." It will target the 25 to 35-year-olds, not necessarily single.

Premier Jewish Singles run by David Miller and Roxanne Weisman – Travel programs in exotic venues are offered as a unique way to meet other singles and see new places around the world such as Alaska, Panama or Costa Rica.

Games Jewish Singles Play started by Mollie Rothman – The non-profit program (there's a $5 charge) runs once every two months at Beth Torah synagogue. Jewish singles play board games and card games such as Trivial Pursuit, bingo and bridge.

Oasis special events for singles, recently started as an alternative way for singles to meet – Oasis organizes workshops that focus on education and interaction. Guest speakers introduce different topics and participants are broken up into discussion groups. The group plans to hold one to two workshops per month at Above and Beyond, a massive complex that simulates being outdoors.

The Beth David Jewish single parents group, started by Marla Kleinberg and Eva Iszo – The group meets on the last Thursday of every month to hear guest speakers on various topics. Kleinberg says the group was started by "two young widows who wanted to meet other single parents, but didn't want to go to the dances." The group is aimed at single parents with younger children and teenagers.

Meet Your Match, recently started by Beth Radom Congregation – This is a discreet, personalized service to help introduce Jewish men and women of all ages.

Yiddish concert draws over 1,000

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The young members of the Shadowland Theatre posted signs in Yiddish saying "Love Health and Beauty." And intertwined with the signs was a golden paper chain symbolizing the link between the Diaspora and Israel's 50th anniversary.

The golden chain set the tone for the recent 16th annual Yiddish concert in the sanctuary at Adath Israel Congregation, where the concert was moved from Earl Bales Park because of inclement weather.

The young people and actor Howard Jerome got the concert underway in a novel fashion, asking the audience of 1,000 to sing along with transliterated Yiddish: "Efnt dem toier, efnt im breyt" (Open the door, open it wide) was the opening line of the lyrics, a plea for everyone to learn a Yiddish song.

This was hardly over when down the aisle of the sanctuary came the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band led by David Buchbinder and blowing up a storm.

Informality was the keynote as the band and soloists Stella Walker and David Wall sang Yiddish songs, old and new, happy and soulful, supported by the stellar musicians of the band, Sasha Luiminksy, Bob Stevenson, Daniel Barnes, and Andrew Downie. Clarinetist Stevenson was outstanding.

One number flowed into another with few introductions. In fact, things were so informal that after the intermission, Buchbinder said the concert would begin again as soon as they found their drummer!

Ethel Cooper, chair of the Yiddish Committee of UJA Federation, pleaded with the large audience to support teaching of Yiddish, which she described as "the foundation of Ashkenaz culture in Toronto."

Yiddish was termed a "treasure chest" and "vibrant element" of culture for all ages, by Joseph Steiner, UJA Federation president.

"We are proud of what our Yiddish committee is doing," he said, paying tribute to the work of retiring staffer Sylvia Lustgarten and the committee's new director, Adam Fuerstenberg.

The concert was co-sponsored by Ashkenaz, which will hold its next big festival Aug. 30 to Sept. 1, 1999.

גידי קורן וחברים

"ישראל: לא עם, לא מדינה, לא חברה, אלא אוסף של נימוקים. כמעט שישה מליון אזרחים פה - שישה מליון ראשי ממשלה, אם לא שישה מליון נביאים, משיחים, מושיעים, כל אחד ואחת עם נוסחה אישית לגאולה בשלושה מהלכים"

SHMOOZIN
"Kosher dining seems to be going upscale and diverse."
"Our community now has a kosher Italian restaurant and a couple of kosher Chinese food places."
"And soon a restaurant featuring kosher French cuisine will be opening."
"Now, if we could only get someone to open a good old-fashioned kosher Jewish deli!"

Products kosher to the COR

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — From French pâtés and cookies, to artichoke bottoms, to exotic pastas, Kosher City Plus offers over 2,000 kosher items in its new 3,000 square foot premises.

Owner Jimmy Kadoch says that the entire store is under the supervision of COR – bakery items, groceries, and freezer stock. He researches kosher products from all over the world, and imports many products not available in other stores.

Kosher City Plus has a large selection of kosher cheese, including Brie, goat cheese and kashkeval. There is an olive bar ("the only kosher one in the city") and Kadoch plans to begin an ice-cream shop, completely Cholov Yisroel or pareve.

It is a one-stop shop, including quality vegetables, health foods, fresh poultry, frozen pizza, and its own packaged products.

Free delivery is available with a minimum purchase, and customers may fax orders, to 782-4685. A catalogue is planned as well.

Hallmarks of the store are personal service, good prices, no-limit specials, and friendly staff. "We treat customers like family – we even know many of their names," he said. "It is an old fashioned way of shopping for the nineties."

The No Frills supermarket on Centre Street in Vaughan, which opened in May, makes a concerted effort to serve its Jewish clientele. Jewish specialty cards, kosher breads from Hermes, Carmel, and My Zaidys (store owner John Ciarallo wants to get baked goods too), Cholov Yisroel dairy products, fresh and frozen meat and fish, are grouped together. The entire centre of the store is given over to kosher grocery products. There is even Cholov Yisroel milk available in the coffee machine.

The store supports community events, and tries to give special deals to camps. "We are a discount market," Ciarallo emphasized, "with competitive prices."

Weary and hungry shoppers at the Spring Farm shopping plaza can refresh themselves at a Kosherland food cart outside IGA. From 10 a.m. to 6 Sunday to Thursday, and 10 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. on Friday, you can get different kinds of hot dogs, corn dogs, and cotton candy.

Levitt's meats is now under the supervision of Star-K, as well as maintaining the MK hashkachah. While this will not have an appreciable effect in Toronto (the Levitts outlet in North York doesn't sell fresh meat), spokesperson Lorne Brookman says that this will enable the company to be better accepted in United States markets.

Metropolitan Ice Cream has added two new flavors: Moka espresso, a blend of coffee and chocolate, and strawberries & cream, a mixture of fresh strawberries with a vanilla base.

Strawberry sorbet, a fat-free, dairy-free and cholesterol-free frozen dessert, is made with 90 percent real fruit.

Kosher Gourmet is the new name for Aish Hatorah caterers B & D. Besides dairy (Cholov Yisroel) and pareve catering from its premises, owner Brian Korn will go to your home and cook family meals, or even a romantic dinner for two – including cleanup.

The home cooking can be dairy, pareve or meat.

Two new restaurants have opened recently, one dairy and one meat.

Cafe Orly, in the new strip mall on Bathurst near Sultana, which also houses Kosher City Plus, offers omelets, pizza, sandwiches, and pasta offerings, as well as gourmet pastries.

Super Sub, in what was the short-lived Royal Casablanca restaurant, offers a limited menu of shwarma, chicken, hamburgers, hot dogs and tuna, on either pita or subs. A wide variety of salads are available.

King Solomon's Table, now owned by the Diamond and Elmaleh families, has a new menu, with an expanded Chinese buffet, more continental selections, and an enlarged wine and liquor list.

They offer the restaurant, at no fee, for Saturday evening bar and bat mitzvahs, or Sunday brunch.

Taste of Tikvah, in the Promenade Circle has won an award for quality and cleanliness from the public health departments of both York Region and Vaughan. It celebrated by inviting the public for an evening of free food last month.

Tov-Li Pizza, Falafel & More has settled into its new larger quarters on Bathurst at Cedarcroft. Even the ordinary pizzas are interesting, including such toppings as pineapple, garlic, or artichokes.

Their gourmet pizzas include

STRUB'S Pickle Corner STRUB'S

Vol. 1, No. 4 • July 16, 1998

Hello! How are ya'? What's cooking? We're busy preparing for our heavy production season that will start with the cucumber harvest in mid-July. Ninety percent (90%) of our pickles are made from Ontario cukes grown on small family-run farms. We all work long hours to make sure the cucumbers, and the pickles, are the freshest and the best anywhere in North America. Enjoy the fruits of our labours!

Letter from camp

I love Strub's pickles, I eat them every day.
I love Strub's pickles, in each and every way.
When I eat them, I smile
And you can see them from a mile.
Their tasty taste is nice and strong,
And they will never lead you wrong.
I love Strub's pickles, I really do.
I love Strub's pickles, and so should you!

— from Kayla, Jessica, Nicola, Hanna, Jessica, Sharie, Alexis, and Rebecca, Camp Shalom Cabin 12

Doctor attends leadership institute

By PETER CAULFIELD
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Dr. Cliff Ungar, a local general practitioner, was one of 23 young leaders from the Lower Mainland who spent one week at the Wexner Heritage Foundation's 1998 summer institute at Snowbird, Utah.

The Wexner Heritage Foundation was started in 1986 by New York clothing magnate and philanthropist Leslie Wexner to educate Jewish communal leaders in the history, thought, traditions and contemporary challenges of the Jewish people.

The two-year program is comprised of three out-of-town summer institutes, and bi-weekly lectures delivered by Jewish scholars and experts flown in by the foundation to Canadian cities. Many of the speakers in the program are engaged by the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver (JFGV) to deliver free public lectures to the Jewish community.

Leaders and potential leaders from the Montreal and Toronto Jewish communities also take part in the program. This marks the first time the two-year program has been offered in Canada.

"It's a tremendous opportunity. It will also equip me to face the challenges in my personal and professional life and as a volunteer in the Jewish community," he says.

Ungar, 43, grew up in Saint-Laurent and Town of Mount Royal, Quebec. He attended Talmud Torah and Herzliah High School, and took part in youth activities at the YM/YWHA in Snowdon.

He graduated from McGill University medical school and came to the west coast in 1981 to intern at the Royal Columbian Hospital in New Westminster. He has a practice in Port Moody, and lives in Vancouver with his wife, Sandra, and their 5-year-old daughter Hannah.

Ungar did not get seriously involved in the Jewish community until he married and started a family. "It just seemed like the right thing to do. Being involved and taking part helps me and it also helps the Jewish community. It's fun and rewarding."

Ungar has sat on the board of JFGV for four years, and has been a Federation vice-president in charge of communications for two years.

Between 1991 and 1997, Ungar was active in the Burquest Jewish Community Association, which serves a small Jewish community scattered throughout the residential suburbs of Burnaby, New Westminster, Coquitlam, Port Coquitlam and Port Moody. He edited and published the Chai Times newsletter and for three years, helped run services in the basement of his home.

"I think I have something to offer the Lower Mainland Jewish community as it faces the challenges of the years ahead," he says.

The west coast has some unique problems to grapple with, he says. "We have the fastest rate of growth of any Jewish community in Canada, but we lack the infrastructure to match our needs. The high cost of living here, especially the cost of housing, means we have limited resources.

"We have a diverse community. "That means we seldom speak with one voice, but it also makes Vancouver a very exciting place to be a Jew."

CLARIFICATION

Unfortunately, production gremlins knocked out the last line of Rabbi Gunther Plaut's column of July 9. We here reproduce the full text of the final paragraph:

Burg, whose son is now the chair of the Jewish Agency, belongs to a vanishing breed. He draws on a multitude of intellectual sources and does so with great charm, without putting down his audience. On the contrary, he is one of the few who can manage to pull it up to his own level, and that is an experience of which one can never have enough.

The CJN regrets the omission.

Five percent more families helped by JIAS in 1997

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Business has been up for the national office of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services of Canada (JIAS) over its previous fiscal year, the latest figures show.

The agency released its annual figures last week, and they show it aided 665 families in its 1997-98 fiscal year, or nearly 1,600 individuals in 10 Canadian cities, excluding Montreal and Toronto.

JIAS has local offices in Toronto and Montreal, and they calculate totals for those cities separately.

The cities in which JIAS provides services outside Montreal and Toronto are Vancouver, Calgary, Edmonton, Winnipeg, Ottawa, Hamilton, London, Windsor, Halifax and St. John's.

The national figures show a five percent increase in the total over the year before, said JIAS Canada national executive director Michael Bricks.

Bricks described the latest figures as "very strong," and said they showed a new trend: a larger influx of Jewish immigrants from South America.

Although the bulk of JIAS-assisted arrivals came from Russia and the former Soviet republics, Bricks said the agency is seeing an increase in those arriving from South America, particularly Buenos Aires and Sao Paulo.

As well, JIAS's national office provided service where it had not before, namely, in Kitchener, Ont., Lethbridge, Alta., and Moose Jaw, Sask., meaning Jewish immigrants are settling outside the larger centres, Bricks noted.

JIAS's Toronto office aided 650 immigrant families in 1997-98, while the total for Montreal was 556 families.

Sharon Hochberg of Windsor was recently welcomed as JIAS Canada's new president for a two-year term. She replaces Adrian Albert of Edmonton.

In the coming days, JIAS Canada is expected to launch its Web site. The address is [www.jias.org].

* * *

Last month, JIAS's national office joined several agencies brought together to advise the federal government on how it should spend money on immigrant services in Ontario.

Ottawa must distribute a one-time surplus to Ontario immigrant settlement services in recognition of the proportionately larger number of immigrants arriving in the province.

One area in which JIAS's expertise was sought is how to make smaller urban centres more accessible to newcomers. The agency's service providers in London, Hamilton, Windsor and Ottawa will be approached by federal immigration officials in the consultation process, which will culminate in the submission of funding proposals this autumn.

zucchini and tomato, broccoli and cauliflower, eggplant and roasted peppers, or greco-Roman, a no-tomato sauce pizza topped with vegetables and feta cheese, on an extra crispy and light crust. Owner Eddy Gozlan and his wife Bruria, also serve many different salads, pasta dishes, Israeli sandwiches, and baked goods, together with gourmet coffees.

The regular coffee is Lavazza coffee from Italy, which Gozlan calls the best coffee in the world.

A new bakery has opened in the Bathurst-Lawrence area. Hole in One specializes in different kinds of bagels, exotic grain breads, donuts, and pastries. You can also get sandwiches and gourmet coffees there.

An interesting development, and a sign of the increasingly sophisticated palates of the kosher consumer, is the LCBO kiosk at the Spring Farm plaza. It sells the kosher wines, liquors, and spirits that regular LCBO stores offer, all in one small storefront. You can also select a gift basket, or choose an imported lager or beer.

A new kosher product that has appeared in stores (including the two featured in this article) are food wraps, in such exotic flavors as lemon thai, mediterranean and garden tomato. They are found in the refrigerator section.

Businessman taking Collins before rights tribunal

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Vancouver columnist Doug Collins has another date with the British Columbia Human Rights Commission – this time for a series of articles that allegedly cause hatred or contempt towards Jews.

Victoria businessman Harry Abrams is taking Collins before the human rights body, along with the North Shore News, for four columns written between January and April 1994 that Abrams believes promote contempt of Jews. The case begins on July 20 though the initial complaint dates back four years.

Abrams said his case was put on hold while another complaint by Canadian Jewish Congress was adjudicated by a human rights tribunal. That case focused on a single column written by Collins, Hollywood Propaganda, that also appeared in the North Shore News and that criticized the Oscar-winning film, Schindler's List. Last November, a rights tribunal found the column "nasty, insulting, smug and anti-Semitic" and "likely to make it more acceptable for others to express hatred or contempt against Jewish people." But the tribunal concluded it was not hateful enough to warrant action under the B.C. Human Rights Act.

Abrams said his case differs from the previous one on a number of bases, primarily in this contention that there is an ongoing, multiple pattern to Collins' writings. The columns in question are allegedly "group libel, an anti-Semitic canard that should be discouraged," he said.

The articles, which includes Hollywood Propaganda, focus on denial of the Holocaust and "Jewish conspiracies," he said.

Abrams, who runs his own advertising business, said two weeks of time have been set aside for the hearing, which will be held in a ballroom at the Ocean Point Resort Hotel in Victoria.

Dr. Lionel Kenner, a retired professor of philosophy from Simon Fraser University, will be called as an expert witness to analyze Collins' writing technique while other witnesses will examine anti-Semitism in Canada, he said.

Abrams is seeking $5,000 in damages from both Collins and the North Shore News, which will go towards the legal fund of B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights. He is a also seeking $2,000 for his lost time and expenses, a full apology and an undertaking that Collins and the North Shore News refrain from publishing similar material in the future, he said.

The League will be seeking intervener status in the case, said Marvin Kurz, the organization's national legal counsel.

Kurz, who is also the League's co-chair, said Abrams' case addresses a concern in the earlier ruling involving Collins that the Hollywood Propaganda story was merely an isolated incident. The other articles are "at least as bad," he said.

In other developments, the Canadian Human Rights Commission hearing into the "Zundelsite" Web page has been adjourned until November. In the interim, Zundel's lawyer, Doug Christie, is seeking judicial review of several commission rulings. If successful, the rulings could bring the case to a halt.

Christie is seeking a review of the commission's decision not to stay proceedings on the grounds of its alleged bias; he is seeking a review of a decision by a Federal Court judge not to grant an interim stay; he is seeking a review of a commission ruling that truth could not be a defence in a hearing to determine whether statements promoted contempt of identifiable groups; and he's seeking a review of a commission decision denying expert status to two witnesses advanced by Zundel.

Gerald Berger was a leader in Ottawa

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Toronto native and longtime Ottawa resident Gerald Berger, 60, died recently just days after the Ottawa Jewish community awarded him the Gilbert Greenberg Distinguished Service Award.

Obituary

Son of the late Salome and Lou Berger, Gerald Berger graduated from the University of Toronto and earned an MBA from Columbia University before accepting a position with the federal government in Ottawa. He became active in the Jewish community and met his wife Ruth at a lecture at the Jewish Community Centre.

Berger was a past president of the Jewish Community Council of Ottawa/Vaad Ha'Ir, Jewish Community Campus and Jewish Community Foundation. He was chair of the public service division of United Jewish Appeal, was active in the United Way and the Canadian National Institute for the Blind and was a member of the Canadian Olympic Association.

At 56 he became federal coordinator of the 1994 Commonwealth Games in Victoria, and special advisor to the minister of state for fitness and amateur sport.

Simon Reisman, under whom Berger worked in the early years of his career, was quoted in the Ottawa Citizen describing Berger as "the smoothest, most diplomatic, most capable public servant I ever met."

Reisman was among those who nominated Berger for the highest level of membership in the Order of Canada.

In 1994, Berger retired from the public service and spent the last years of his life as a business-government consultant.

Rabbi Arnold Fine of Agudath Israel Congregation said Berger was one of the first people to befriend him when he arrived in Canada. "I arrived here 17 years ago, not knowing very much about Canada and even less about its Jewish community...He brought me books, he sat with me, he taught me the uniqueness of this country. I received lessons in the governance of Canada and its impact upon the Jewish community."

Rabbi Fine said in his eulogy that Berger "knew where he was going and he succeeded...Gerry was a very proud Canadian who contributed much to his country."

Asked at one time which of his many accomplishments made him most proud, Berger replied "my children."

Alleged war criminal named

deaths of Nemsila and Kenstavicius stopped short court hearings that would have cleared up legal issues pertaining to their cases but which may resurface in the Nebel case.

At a hearing before an Immigration adjudicator, Nemsila's lawyer successfully argued that by obtaining "domicile" after five years residency in Canada, he was immune from deportation. The adjudicator's decision was reversed on appeal by a Federal Court judge but Nemsila died before the Federal Court of Appeal could render a definitive ruling.

Canadian Jewish Congress welcomed the case against Nebel. "This announcement shows the federal Justice Department war crimes unit continues to work steadily on bringing new cases forward," said Irving Abella, chair of Congress' war crimes committee. "There is a level of aggressiveness being displayed which helps us believe that some form of justice may be formed after all."

"We will proceed expeditiously with this case," said Justice Minister Anne McLellan.

"The federal government is determined to ensure that Canada is not a safe haven for those alleged to have committed war crimes...regardless of when those events occurred."

Politicos fly east for summer Israel tour

Scene in Ottawa

By STEPHEN BINDMAN

OTTAWA — So what did you do on your summer vacation?

Here in the nation's capital, apparently not very much.

The nation's business in Ottawa has seemingly ground to a complete halt.

The House of Commons is recessed for nearly three months. There is not the usual flurry of government press releases, if you don't count the ones announcing new bridge construction in rural Nova Scotia. There are few press scrums with cabinet ministers or news conferences with interest groups.

In fact, it almost seems like more federal business is being conducted these days in – yes – Israel.

So far this summer, almost a dozen MPs and senators have travelled to the Holy Land.

First up was Unity Minister Stephane Dion, who spent a dizzying week meeting and touring in Israel.

The catalyst for his first visit was a keynote speech to the Israel Association for Canadian Studies at Hebrew University entitled The Canadian Ideal.

But the workaholic reformed academic wouldn't rest his laurels on one speech and spent several exhausting days meeting with officials of all political stripes, including Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and PLO chief Yasser Arafat.

Dion breakfasted with PLO executive Faisal Husseini, lunched with well-known Palestinian spokesperson Hanan Ashrawi and conferred with Shimon Peres, several Israeli cabinet ministers and Supreme Court president Aharon Barak.

The minister says the things that left the greatest impression on him were just how small the country is, how complex its problems are and how key water is to such a tiny nation.

"There are many thing that I knew, but the opportunity to go there now I feel them," Dion said in an interview upon his return.

"Mackenzie King said that Canada is full of geography but lacks history. There, it's exactly the contrary – and the history has been shaped around water. When you think about how you may give some territory to the Palestinians, it's not only what is safe regarding geostrategic perspectives, it's also what is safe regarding the capacity for Israel to have water.

"Now I feel problems that before I was able to understand but not to feel."

Dion, whose official title is President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs but whose unofficial job is to fight Quebec separatists, said he has also come to learn how Canada's secular struggles pale in comparison to day-to-day life in Israel.

"I would not like to exchange our problems with them. There, it seems that nobody is suggesting seriously to have a state where people would be citizens, where you would have two official languages, Arabic and Hebrew. It seems impossible."

Dion was accompanied by his wife Janine Krieber (a Concordia University professor who also delivered a paper at the conference) and daughter Jeanne (not at taxpayers' expense, you'll be pleased to know).

Next to land was a group of MPs, senators and Ontario MPPs, courtesy of the Canada-Israel Committee.

For more than 20 years, the national advocacy group has been bringing elected and non-elected Canadian decision-makers to Israel for a firsthand look at the complex Middle East dynamic.

"We never hide our parochial perspective – we're pro-Israel, we want to see Canada and Israel's bilateral relationship flourish and we want to advance our perspective on the larger Middle East issues, such as the peace process," said Shimon Fogel, director of government relations.

"But the function of this trip is exclusively for them to get a very direct sense of what the issues are, what the perspectives on those issues are, what some of the challenges are. To that end, we work very very hard to ensure that they are exposed to the broadest possible spectrum of opinion, both Jewish and non-Jewish.

"Our goal is for them to be able to come back home and when they take notice of developments that arise in the media they're much more grounded in what that means for some of the larger issues. When they hear about settlements, they understand what a settlement is."

Inevitably, Fogel says, there isn't a parliamentarian who doesn't return "struck by how different reality is from what they're initial perceptions were before going over.

"Throughout the whole experience, it just brings to life the things that they have read about in a very removed way for many years."

This year's group includes Liberal MPs Marlene Jennings, Albina Guarnieri, Brent St. Denis, Carolyn Bennett, Paddy Torsney and Reg Belair, Liberal Senator Sharon Carstairs, Conservative MPs Greg Thompson and Norm Doyle and Ontario politicians John Baird and Dwight Duncan.

"It will be a really interesting experience to be in a country that's so small and yet has such a vibrant economy and is in the international news all the time," Torsney, an energetic two-term MP from Burlington, Ont., said before her departure.

Torsney, who has been active lobbying countries around the world to sign the international treaty banning land mines treaty, also hopes she'll come to better "understand" Israel's refusal to join the process.

We'll let you know who fills up the rest of the summer Israel tour.

New projects, staff keep JCS busy in summer

TORONTO — There's no summer lull at Jewish Campus Services (JCS) of Greater Toronto, as summer students work on new initiatives, and new staff members fill positions of those who've been promoted.

Some changes that may be of interest to Toronto students are:

• JCS now has a Web site, designed by Ryerson Polytechnic University student Tammy Weisz, at [www.jewishcampusservices.com].

• Summer students Mark Buzaglo and Alana Balaban are refining the Cartice, signing up new businesses to make the JCS membership card more attractive.

• Balaban is also working on a fall program on eating disorders.

• Nadia Sapiro, also a summer student, is developing a conference on employment and Jewish students. It is being planned in conjunction with Jewish Vocational Service.

• Summer student Michal Kaye is updating JCS' mailing lists.

• Pearl Gropper Berman, former director of York University's Jewish Student Federation, has been appointed assistant executive director of JCS. Her responsibilities include citywide programming, initiatives such as the employment conference, staff supervision and development and on-site campus support.

• Lance Davis, former program director of the Jewish Students' Union at the University of Toronto, has been appointed JCS' director of education. His responsibilities include developing campus and citywide educational programs, leadership development, major seminars and staff development with respect to Jewish education.

• Davis will also co-ordinate a new initiative with Kedma, the Orthodox Zionist student group, to provide programs and services to Orthodox students.

• Michelle Lackie replaces Lance Davis as program director at U of T. She has a B.Ed. from McGill University and a strong background in the Conservative movement, both in United Synagogue Youth and Camp Ramah.

• Jason Soloway has joined JCS as a program associate for one year, based at U of T.

• Stephanie Wener, a former Hillel Jewish Campus Service Corps (JSCS) fellow, has joined JCS' permanent staff. She'll continue to be based at Ryerson and U of T.

• Tamar Kagan, a recent U of T graduate, becomes co-ordinator of JCS' Arts and Culture portfolio. She's currently leading a creative arts program in Israel for the summer.

• Jordie Caplan, a graduate of Carleton University, will be based at York University as a member of the JCSC Fellowship.

• Two full-time positions remain to be filled, that of program director at York University and a new position, that of JCSC Fellow for Koach, the Conservative Movement on Campus. (Former Koach fieldworker Adam Silver left recently to become manager, chapter development at Child Find Ontario.)

• A part-time fieldworker for Kesher - Reform on Campus is also being sought to build effective programming for Reform students. The newly created position was announced by Zac Kaye, JCS executive director, and Jack Zarek, JCS acting president in a recent news release.

• JCS' first annual general meeting will take place in early September.

• The agency is inviting parents to become friends and partners of JCS to ensure its financial future, Zarek announced.

• Zarek also expressed delight with progress being made on a new JSU facility at U of T.

Mofaz faces many challenges

By ARIEH O'SULLIVAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

One of Lt.-Gen. Shaul Mofaz's most obvious first tasks as IDF chief of general staff is to shed any impression that he is going to be a "yes-man" to his benefactor, Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai.

A talented, courageous and experienced commander, Mofaz enters his office in the general staff headquarters with the burden of facing a public and a general staff who feel there was someone perhaps more qualified for the job: Matan Vilna'i.

When he gathered his general staff for its first meeting in Tel Aviv last week, he laid out his credo.

It was said to be not so much a description of his vision for the IDF of the 20th century, as a plea to his fellow officers to work together.

His immediate challenges will be to complete the reshuffling of his general staff, and he is expected to promote at least four brigadier generals. He must work to consolidate a multi-year program and secure a defence budget.

These are the areas where we will be able to gauge whether he is Mordechai's lackey or strong enough to stand on his own. It will also be interesting to see whether he plans to forge a working dialogue with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, something his predecessor did not have.

Furthermore, when Mordechai said that Mofaz's success is the success of all us, he really meant Mofaz's success was Mordechai's success.

Mofaz will be given his period of grace. But if he turns out to be less than a success, it will help boost the impression that Mordechai's selection of Mofaz was clouded by a personal grudge against Vilna'i.

In the longer term, Mofaz's challenges to reshape the IDF to meet the changing threats against Israel are most pertinent. He must implement the updated defence doctrine being drafted now in the Defence Ministry and work to confront the growing threat of surface-to-surface missiles and weapons of mass destruction.

Mofaz's tenure will most likely be one of the most complicated in the history of the country, since Israel is entering an era where states which have no common border with it can threaten its very existence.

Protection and long-arm deterrence are expensive, but the defence budget is dwindling more and more each year as the running costs of the IDF grow. Mofaz will need to lead the IDF in making some drastic cuts in manpower, reducing rear units and staff officers.

Lebanon will simmer, but the overriding concern will be the clock ticking away in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, where Yasser Arafat's Palestinian Authority appears to be waiting for May 1999 to declare an independent state.

Mofaz's IDF must be able to provide the government, whoever it may comprise, with the freedom, strength and options to decide how it will handle such a scenario.

U.S. 'inconsistent': official

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — A senior government official has criticized the U.S. negotiating team for being "inconsistent" – initially accepting and endorsing Israeli proposals, but then repudiating them after receiving negative reactions from Palestinian Authority leaders.

Meanwhile, two senior PA officials, Saeb Erekat and Nabil Shaath, went to Washington at the invitation of the State Department for talks about the prospective IDF pullback in the West Bank.

The senior official would neither confirm nor deny a Channel 1 report that the United States is working on sponsoring a meeting between Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai and the PA's deputy chairman, Mahmoud Abbas.

The official also denied that Secretary of State Madeleine Albright had said the United States would terminate its mediation effort by the end of the month.

"She did not say any of those things. He added that the leak came from Washington, not Jerusalem.

He alleged there was an American tendency to "vacillate and backtrack" when dealing with issues germaine to the peace process. He indicated this could undercut Netanyahu's intention to announce the government's readiness to implement a 13.1 percent redeployment in the West Bank.

Netanyahu insists that this be done by the Palestine National Council, as required by the Palestine Liberation Organization's own regulations. Albright reportedly does not go along with Netanyahu on this.

Netanyahu met separately with President Ezer Weizman and Labor Party Chair Ehud Barak to update them about the peace talks, but nothing was said publicly by any of them about the pertinent details.

Knesset rejects yeshiva draft bill

Arab legislators voted against the bills in exchange for a promise from the religious parties to oppose any future initiative to impose any form of national service on Israel's Arab population.

Barak's bill was defeated by a 53-45 vote. A similar bill introduced by the secularist Meretz party was voted down by 53-41.

One member of the cabinet, Public Security Minister Avigdor Kahalani, gave his support to Barak's bill.

Last week's Knesset session turned into a confrontation between Barak and his former subordinate when he was army chief of staff, Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai.

Barak claimed there was no justification for the fact that behind every soldier who "can look at the enemy directly in the eyes," there would be 10 Israeli youths who would stay at home.

Mordechai, who spoke for the government, retorted that Barak's motives for introducing the bill were political.

He added that there was no guarantee that a draft of yeshivah students would improve Israel's security situation and that the move would only deepen rifts in Israeli society.

The haredi parties expressed anger at Barak for introducing his bill, saying the move would prevent them for supporting him in any run for the premiership.

50 Years Ago

JERUSALEM, July 5 — A pitched battle, during which small arms, machine guns, mortars and cannon were used, took place in Jerusalem this weekend. The 12-hour exchange of shot and shell, the first major break of the truce in Jerusalem, occurred after Arab snipers in the Old City began firing on Jewish positions. The Jews replied with small arms fire and the Arabs soon brought up heavy weapons, after which the Jews too brought their batteries into play. At one point the UN headquarters was under fire. One Arab woman in an Israeli-held hospice was shot and killed by Arab snipers while eight other Jews were injured.

France increases Mideast profile

By JAY BUSHINSKY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Syrian President Hafez al-Assad's state visit to France next week will provide his official hosts with a golden opportunity to upgrade their involvement in the Middle East peace process, especially on the Israel-Syria and Israel-Lebanon tracks, a senior government source said.

It will enable President Jacques Chirac and his foreign minister, Hubert Vedrine, to seek Assad's participation in a French-sponsored international conference in which the other main Arab participants would be Egypt, Jordan and the Palestinian Authority.

The source said Israel did not expect to receive an invitation and has opposed this initiative from its inception.

But the possibility of a breakthrough in the impasse over Israel's offer to implement UN Security Council Resolution 425 by withdrawing the IDF from the security zone in southern Lebanon was seen as a possible outcome of the impending dialogue between the French and Syrian heads of state.

Success in facilitating implementation of Resolution 425 by convincing Assad to approve the Lebanese Army's assumption of responsibility for security in the south would be a major progression from France's role in expediting the recent exchange of Hezbollah prisoners and the remains of their colleagues for the body of Third Petty Officer Itamar Ilya.

Assad's stay in France will have an additional dimension: Chirac personally and the French public, especially the Jewish community, will expect him to clarify the whereabouts and status of fugitive Nazi SS Hauptsturmfuehrer Alois Brunner. Brunner was the wartime commandant of the Drancy transit camp, from which more than 70,000 French Jews were transported to Auschwitz.

France has a longstanding request for Brunner's extradition to stand trial for crimes against humanity. It is based on evidence that Brunner has been hiding in Syria since 1959.

During the run-up to Assad's arrival, major French newspapers have reactivated coverage of the Brunner case under giant headlines such as "The Man Responsible for the Death of 100,000 Jews."

Nazi hunter Serge Klarsfeld pointed out that Assad's visit is to coincide with the annual commemoration of the mass roundup of Jews by the Vichy French police July 16 and 17, 1942.

Klarsfeld said he believes Chirac will press Assad for specific information about Brunner and possibly for his handover.

VW ups compensation ante

By PETER EPHROSS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Volkswagen's decision to establish a fund for Jewish slave laborers ups the ante on other German companies to make similar payments.

Just three weeks after the German car company rejected demands to compensate 30 Jewish slave laborers who had worked for Volkswagen during World War II, the auto manufacturer agreed last week to set up a fund for them.

According to a history financed by the company two years ago, Volkswagen employed 15,000 slave workers to help in the German war effort.

Hailing the move as a "bold step" and a "breath of fresh air," Rabbi Abraham Cooper, associate dean of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre in Los Angeles, said, "We now hold up Volkswagen as a corporate leader" in making amends to slave laborers.

Rabbi Cooper noted that in 1995, Volkswagen led a campaign against a Japanese publishing company after one of its magazines published a Holocaust-denial article on the 50th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz.

Klaus von Muenchhausen, the lawyer who had threatened a class-action lawsuit on behalf of the 30 laborers, all of whom were employed by the firm as teen-agers and now live in Israel, said he would pursue similar action against Varta, a battery company, and Hochtief, a construction company.

Many of the estimated millions of slave laborers who worked for Volkswagen and other companies under the Nazi regime have died, and the issue of making payments before much more time elapses is crucial because of the survivors' advanced age.

Volkswagen said it would provide details about the fund in September.

The German government made compensation payments to slave laborers for their imprisonment and for health damages, but has refused to pay back wages. German firms generally have also refused to pay back wages, saying that these were the government's responsibility.

In May, the Karl Diehl armament company agreed, under political pressure, to pay $552 per month in back wages to each slave laborer.

While it was unclear how much money Volkswagen would pay the laborers, von Muenchhausen was quoted as saying his clients would seek $2,200 for each month worked.

CJN Rosh Hashanah Photo Contest

The CJN announces its fourth annual Rosh Hashanah photo contest. We are asking readers to submit their own original photographs either of Israel or on any Jewish theme in their community.

Anyone can enter except CJN employees or members of their families.

A maximum of three photos per entrant may be submitted. Please write your name, address and phone number on the back of each photo. We can only return the photos if you provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope.

You may mail or deliver your photos to: The CJN Rosh Hashanah Contest, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, Toronto, Ont., M3B 3K4.

The judges will choose three photographs which, in their opinion, are the most expressive and evocative. These three photos will be published in The CJN Rosh Hashanah issue, Sept. 17, 1998. Each of the "winning" photographers will receive a cheque for $100.

We will undoubtedly receive many worthy submissions. But only three will be selected as the "winners." The decisions of the judges will be final. The odds of winning depend upon the number and the quality of submissions received.

Winning entrants will be notified by telephone before Shabbat on Sept. 4, 1998.

Along with these three photos, The CJN will also publish 10 photos from the Israel Experience Photo Contest sponsored by UIA Federations Canada, the Canada Israel Experience Centre and El Al Israel Airlines. Israel Experience participants aged 15 to 24 should contact the UIA office for details.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

Haunting dreams form basis of swirly, twirly paintings

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Sandra Silberzweig describes her paintings as "swirly, twirly, full of motion and color."

That is the first impression but there is a compelling depth and symbolism in the host of images she conceives.

Silberzweig, a young mother and homemaker, gemologist and graduate of York and Carleton universities, is also a self-taught artist.

Vivid, haunting dreams which she transcribed into a journal are the basis for many of her works.

There is a reason for the dreams. The firstborn daughter of Eastern European Holocaust survivors, she is deeply affected by both their tragic experience and their recollections of life before the horror.

The dichotomy is particularly evident in two paintings, The Silence and Village Wedding.

The Silence portrays two sections of a town, divided by a road. On one side, ghosts drift above an underground graveyard studded with Magen David-engraved tombstones. On the other side, the village has erupted in frenzy, houses and townspeople tossed into the air. For Silberzweig, the tombstones beneath the earth's surface and the mute spectres above represent the silence before the Holocaust when most Jews put their heads down, refusing to see what was coming.

Village Wedding brings to life the hustle and bustle of a shtetl celebration with its bride and groom, rabbi and dancing wedding guests. A pretty lake enhances the community and a fish is clearly defined in the scene. For Silberzweig, who incorporates diverse Jewish customs and beliefs in her work, the fish represents happiness.

Multi-talented, she has her own company, with a separate division called Haute (pronounced "hot") Plates that features whimsical, brilliantly colored wooden trays and bowls, the jewel-like tones a product of her gemology training.

She collects the dishes from friends on the lookout for the unusual, acquires them from resale stores, or buys wherever she finds something she likes.

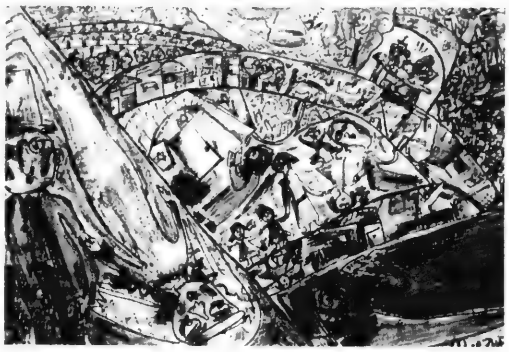
Then, invention takes over.

She designs intricate patterns, then hand paints the dishes using non-toxic acrylic paint and coats them with urethane for protection. Altering a shape, adding a bit, she transforms them into totally new concepts, at once functional and striking.

A simple little bowl glows; a hostess tray sprouts handles made from hand carved duck figurines. All pieces are originals, signed and numbered.

She's had a solo exhibition sponsored by the Koffler Centre for the Arts at the Bathurst Jewish Centre and currently has a show at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue.

Ranging from small "button bowls" starting at $20 to much larger pieces selling for up to $200, Silberzweig's creations are available at both traditional and innovative gift shops and boutiques.



Sandra Silberzweig's Village Wedding has a colorful compelling depth and symbolism in the host of images she conceives.

Urbane play tackles angst of marriage

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The witty, urbane and insightful script by Alex Poch-Goldin was the star of the hit, This Hotel, at the recent Fringe Festival.

The play examines a faltering marriage ("You get married so you can't love anyone else") without pinning blame on husband or wife.

Husband Lester's life is chronicled through subconscious visits in a series of ratty hotel rooms, from his wife, paramours and strangers. The moral: Love is a fleeting and inexplicable phenomenon. Don't try to understand it, just go with the flow.

This Hotel almost takes on the air of a French bedroom farce, so many doors open and close in a hurry, but it rights itself in time to be a serious, though humorous, look at the angst of marriage.

Innovative twists such as the bell hop (Alon Nashman) popping out of thin air to set up a bar on a hotel bed were to the credit of director Kelly Thornton of the experimental Bananafish Company, which, with the New Globe Theatre (Janese Kane), co-produced the piece.

Playing three parts as the wife's lover, a general stud and a befuddled bisexual who denies his marriage is in trouble, Rich Zeppieri lights up the stage. As the enigmatic Lester, Randy Hughson doesn't come to life until the the end when his character comes into focus, while Gisele Rousseau acts intriguingly as the wife doing her own philandering on the side. Veronika Hurnik is the erotic temptress who beguiles Lester in different guises.

There are so many plot twists, it must be difficult to keep This Hotel's running time to the Fringe rule of one hour. Perhaps it needs a neater set and fewer doors. Lester is in enough trouble without them.

Ma, Where Are You?, another Fringe play, is a three-generation look at motherhood that reveals little not found in any paperback on psychotherapy.

The one-woman performance by playwright-actor Gissa Israel (a psychotherapist herself) is a commendable theatrical effort to explain mother-daughter tensions. In dramatic terms, it falls short. The audience's interest flags before the hour is up.

There is no reason to doubt the program note that in previous productions, Ma Where Are You? has encouraged dialogue between parents and children. But the story of the mistakes that parents make in front of quiet but insightful children is pretty familiar. It is summed up in Israel's closing lines, "I'm here, sweetheart, I have always been here. Don't ask why!"

A mother and grandmother herself, Israel has been a psychotherapist for 35 years and grew up in an extended family amid three generations of women. The program says she and her husband, Stephen Grigg, a social worker, live in a unique round house which they designed and constructed themselves on a lush mountainside in the artistic community of Sutton, Que.

Photographer examines the old with new eyes

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A photograph titled Ice Capades shows six ducks lined up diagonally on an icy surface as if they were choreographed and posing for the camera.

Ice Capades, which was shot at Harbourfront Centre, is among 22 works in a new exhibition by Toronto photographer Carolyn Eisen.

Aptly named Just a Moment, the exhibition is comprised of photographs that were "found shots," as Eisen calls them, moments she was able to capture through her camera lens.

"Nothing was arranged for the picture," she notes. "It's a picture of that moment, seen through my eyes."

The exhibition, on at Sunderland Hall at the First Unitarian Church (175 St. Clair Ave. W. at Avenue Road) until July 26, focuses on three places that have been familiar settings for her, Eisen explains.

"The images in this exhibition all come from places very close to me: Toronto neighborhoods, the area in New York where I grew up, and Martha's Vineyard, a place I visit frequently in the summer. For the last few years, I found it satisfying to work in areas where I already had a relationship. I was seeing the old and familiar with new eyes."

Many of the photographs also include images of water in different forms, Eisen adds. "The puddles and other bodies of water, they reflected to me exquisite and moving visual treasures – real water colors."

For example Boats, a picture of the reflection of a boat on the water shot at Martha's Vineyard in 1993, looks like an abstract design.

Images of water reflect visual treasures

Underwater Colors was photographed on the Belt Line trail in Toronto, she notes. "It's shot into the puddles, or the run-off from melted snow in the spring. It's very blue. Trees are recognizable, but people often tell me it looks more like a water color than a photograph."

Katama Colors, a wide-angle shot of a marsh landscape in full autumn hues, was taken at Martha's Vineyard in the fall of 1996 after a major storm, as was Flooded Farm, which depicts a barn sitting in the middle of a flooded field that looks like a lake.

Eisen has been interested in photography since she was a child, but it's only in the last three years that she has given full reign to what she describes as "a hobby gone wild."

An accomplished dancer and writer who is currently working on a biography of a former student, Eisen says she intensified her efforts in photography after showing her work in New York in 1996.

She had made a set of cards with photographs as a birthday present for her mother. At the time, her sister, a New York artist, was involved in an a group art show.

"When my sister saw my work, she wanted me to show it; so she brought it to the committee," Eisen recalls. "The committee invited me to participate in this show."

The response to her work was positive, she says. "I sold several pictures and the cards were also very popular. The cards are also available in this [current] show on Sundays when I'm there."

Eisen began selling her work through Toronto art agent Elaine Lesniak and had a solo exhibition at the Sage Cafe in 1997, followed by her current show.

Despite this success and her interest in other artistic pursuits, Eisen has no plans to give up teaching English as a second language, which she has been doing for 14 years.

"I find teaching and working with people very creative. I never get tired of it."

Just a Moment can be viewed 9 a.m. to 1 p.m. weekdays, Sundays 11:30 a.m. to 12:30 p.m. Call 924-9654 for more information.

TORONTO ACTRESS BROADWAY BOUND

Toronto actress Tamara Podemsky, who has been playing the part of Mrs. Cohen in the Toronto production of Rent for the past 32 weeks, has signed a contract to play that part in the original production of Rent which has been playing at the Nederlander Theatre on Broadway for 2½ years.

Podemsky, the 20-year-old child of a Jewish father and a native Indian mother, left last week for New York, where her contract commits her to stay at least one year. Among her other roles, she appeared in The Rez, a 13-part television series produced by the CBC. Although the CBC did not renew the series, an Israeli television network recently picked it up for airing in Israel.

In conversation with The CJN, Sol Podemsky said his daughter was thrilled to be heading for Broadway. "It's quite a rush for her because it's really her dream come true," he said. "This is her big break."

In the Spotlight: Before the momentous day in 1993 when he underwent surgery, it would have been hard for anyone to predict that Yaron Cohen of Tel Aviv would one day – as a female transexual singer named Dana International – take the entertainment world by storm.

The slender six-foot-three diva, who sings in English, Hebrew and Arabic, has had three best-selling albums in Israel and been voted the country's best female singer. Pirated copies of her albums also reportedly sold in the millions in Egypt and Jordan before she was banned in those countries for being "a corrupter of youth."

In May she gained more international prominence by winning the high-profile Eurovision Song Contest, and there has been speculation since then that she would replace Ginger, the singer who left the Spice Girls.

Dana International, who said she was not interested in becoming a Spice Girl, would probably have no trouble playing the part. A London newspaper recently described her as a "buxom young woman who, clad in a figure-hugging black jumper, looks every inch your sassy Israeli ladette."

Dana has her share of detractors, including one Israeli politician who called her an "abomination" and said "even in Sodom there was nothing like it." In response, she speaks forcefully about the need for social tolerance.

"Look, I don't have a problem with any human being in this world; my message is live and let live. It's not a nice feeling to hate; you suffer, whereas if you love, you feel wonderful. I just say to these people, 'Try to accept me.' My victory [at the Eurovision] has proved that God is with me."

Dana is also a strong proponent of both the gay rights movement and her native Israel. "I love Israel; it's part of my soul," she says. "I am very proud to be an Israeli and get mad when I read what the global media say about us. Eighty per cent of it is wrong."

Documentary looks at Auschwitz's Prisoner 88

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Sigmund Sobolewski is obsessed and guilt-ridden by the Holocaust. He spent four-and-a-half years in Auschwitz-Birkenau, an eternity, a practising Polish Catholic whose horrific experiences left an indelible mark on him.

Sobolewski was one of the first individuals – the 88th to be exact – to be shipped to Auschwitz. He still bears the tattoo "88" on his arm.

Now a resident of Canada, he has devoted his life to two overlapping causes: preserving the memory of the Holocaust through lecture tours and combatting intolerance and bigotry. However, as a result of these pursuits, he has jeopardized his marriage as well as his livelihood.

On July 30, at 10 p.m., and again on Aug. 5 at 2:15 a.m., TVOntario examines the man and his activities in Prisoner 88. A sensitive one-hour profile of Sobolewski, it is directed by David Paperny. (The film had its premiere in June 1996, and was reviewed by my colleague, Ben Rose.)

The son of an army officer, Sobolewski was born in Torun, Poland. In 1929, when he was six, the Sobolewskis moved to Nowy Targ, a town with a sizeable Jewish community.

When the Germans came looking for his father, he was not at home. So they arrested Sobolewski and his mother instead. On June 14, 1940, he was brought to Auschwitz on the first transport of prisoners.

He was relatively lucky, having been assigned to the fire brigade, one of the easiest jobs in the camp. Even so, he was deeply affected by the systematic cruelty, degradation and death that befell its inmates on a daily basis.

In Prisoner 88, Sobolewski, the ultimate survivor, describes his ragged existence, the killing process and the 1944 Jewish revolt, the chief accomplishment of which was the destruction of a crematorium.

The film also chronicles Sobolewski's post-war life: his wanderings through Europe, his immigration to Canada in 1949, his marriage to a Cuban and his ambivalent relationship with his family.

His sons don't really comprehend what happened to him in Auschwitz, though they respect his toughness, his dedication and his crusade against racism. As for his wife, she fears that his obsessive concerns will ruin their struggling business, a hotel and pub in northern Alberta.

In addition, Prisoner 88 makes the point that, among Polish Catholics, Sobolewski seems to be something of an oddity, a person who refers to Jews as "my brothers and sisters of the Hebrew faith," and who argues that the doctrine of Christian contempt toward Jews was a contributory cause of the Holocaust.

Clearly, Sobolewski is a highly unusual and moral man, and in this absorbing documentary Paperny distills the essence of his personality.

Yuri performs in Yiddish

Five years after being rushed to emergency at a Toronto hospital, former Soviet Union Yiddish Theatre star Yuri Tsivtsivadse will perform with Robert Raines and His Orchestra on July 25, 8 p.m. at the Church of the Redeemer, Bloor St. W. at Avenue Rd.

The Romantic "Movie Music" evening features Yuri as Tevya in songs from Fiddler on the Roof and other traditional Yiddish folk songs.

The 25-piece orchestra under the baton of Robert Raines plays familiar music from both new and vintage movies in a smoke-free/alcohol-free setting.

Tickets are $20. Call 416-482-6174.

Yuri became deathly ill while on tour in Toronto. The medical team refused to send him home (due to a collapsing Soviet Union). Yuri has now chosen to live in Toronto.

TRAVEL TALK

BY BILL GLADSTONE

MISCELLANEOUS NOTES FROM ALL OVER

Catskills History: Once upon a time, the Borscht Belt reigned supreme. In the 1950s and 1960s, approximately one million people took vacations in the Catskills annually. The colorful history of this popular vacation area, which was hailed as the playground for New York Jews for a large part of the 20th century, is the focus of a devoted band of Catskills veterans who have been meeting each summer since 1995.

The 4th annual Catskills Conference, which runs Aug. 28 to 31 at the Sunny Oaks Hotel in Woodridge, N.Y., is expected to attract former hotel owners, tummlers, middle-aged waiters and busboys, and guests. The program includes discussions of the legacy of the Catskills, screenings of related films, exhibitions of postcards, and klezmer concerts.

The conference is sponsored by The Catskills Institute, which was established to preserve the memories, artifacts and documents of the Catskills during its heyday. For details contact Phil Brown, 617-354-6138.

Historic Chuppah: Connecticut resident Jane Weitzman, a member of the board of the Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, recently read about a certain chuppah being auctioned off in Dutchess County, N.Y. and arranged to buy it, sight unseen. Turns out the cloth wedding canopy had been used at many marriage ceremonies in DP (displaced persons) camps in Europe between 1945 and 1949.

"I immediately knew it had an incredible history and wanted it back for JDC," Weitzman explained.

The chuppah is blue and white with a gold fringe, and features a large Star of David with the Hebrew word "Zion" at its centre. It is labelled as property of the "Joint" and is on display in the JDC's office, 711 Third Ave. in Manhattan. 212-687-6200.

Art of Arthur Szyk: A master of illuminated manuscripts and editorial cartoons, Arthur Szyk (1894-1951) gained notice for his powerful political cartoons, which appeared in leading newspapers and magazines during World War II.

Eleanor Roosevelt called him a "one-man army" against Hitler. The Times of London said the Haggadah Szyk produced was "worthy of being considered among the most beautiful books ever produced by the hand of man."

These and numerous examples of his illuminated works, ranging from Andersen's fairy tales to Israel's Proclamation of Independence, are on view starting Aug. 16 at the Spertus Institute of Jewish Studies, 618 S. Genetic screening can alert couples to inherited diseases

By JEANNETTE ISRAEL
Special to the CJN

CHICAGO — Everyone would agree that Jews pass on a proud ethnic heritage and a rich cultural tradition to their children.

Unfortunately, Ashkenazi Jews, often descended from close-knit communities segregated for generations from the general population, may also pass on a more tragic and painful legacy.

Because they may share several common ancestors, Jews with forebears from Russia, Poland, Lithuania, Latvia and Romania seem to be most at risk for several genetic mutations that sometimes appear as devastating, incurable diseases in young children.

Tay-Sachs disease is the most prominent example, but there are others as well.

An aggressive education campaign in North American Jewish communities to promote genetic screening has been highly successful in averting many potential Tay-Sachs tragedies by alerting couples to carrier status before their children were born.

Cause for alarm is warranted. Tay-Sachs is a horrific degenerative condition with no cure or treatment.

Very few children survive beyond age six. Symptoms appear generally within the first months or year or two of life, typically characterized by increasing listlessness and inattentiveness, followed by the gradual and continuous loss of skills.

Infants with Tay-Sachs, who at first can sit up and crawl, will eventually become unable even to lift their heads. In later stages, the retina of the eye begins to degenerate, and blindness and paralysis usually precede death.

Although the Tay-Sachs mutation is found in all populations on earth, the prevalence of carriers among Ashkenazi Jews is dramatically higher: one in 31 compared to one in many hundreds for most other groups.

Screening remains a priority for the Jewish community. Hope for a real cure – despite the genetic culprit's identification in the mid-1980s – points toward gene therapy sometime in the distant future.

What many Jews don't realize, however, is that other genetic disorders, also quite devastating, are nearly as prevalent among Ashkenazi Jews as Tay-Sachs.

One is Canavan's disease, which is similar to Tay-Sachs in that it is a degenerative neurological condition that first appears in infancy or early childhood and leads to progressive disability and eventual death.

In Canavan's disease, portions of the brain increase in size over time and become spongy, causing sufferers gradually to lose motor and cognitive skills. The head, too, becomes horribly deformed.

As with Tay-Sachs, both parents must be carriers to have a one-in-four chance of having an affected child, and there is currently no cure and no effective treatment. The carrier rate for Canavan's among eastern European Jews is one in 36.

Unlike Tay-Sachs, however, children with Canavan's disease can survive well into their teenage years, prolonging the heartbreak and burden of care for parents and loved ones.

Despite its being nearly as prevalent, the American College of Medical Genetics only recently recommended that Ashkenazi Jews be screened for Canavan's disease as frequently as for Tay-Sachs.

Screening for Tay-Sachs and Canavan's disease involves a simple blood test that can be arranged by most primary-care physicians.

What makes screening for these conditions so attractive is that the small number of mutations found account for the vast majority of identified cases. This is due to what is known as "the founder effect" – the common ancestor mentioned earlier.

With Canavan's disease, only two mutations account for 98 percent of carrier status in Ashkenazi Jews, while three mutations account for 94 percent in Tay-Sachs.

The fewer mutations isolated as causing a disease, the more accurate screening for them becomes, making accuracy among Jews extremely high compared to potential carriers of other ethnicities.

Although screening is not a treatment or a cure for Tay-Sachs or Canavan's, young soon-to-be-married Ashkenazi couples alerted to dual positive carrier status can at least weigh various options before having children.

Experimental treatment helps heal animals' spinal cords

REHOVOT — Weizmann Institute scientists have managed to partially heal the damaged spinal cords of laboratory animals, according to a study reported in the July issue of Nature Medicine.

A team led by Prof. Michal Schwartz of the neurobiology department used an innovative treatment that allowed rats to regain partial movement in their hind legs after the legs had been paralyzed by damage to the spine.

"The results of our experiments are promising," says Prof. Schwartz. "However, for the moment they have only been achieved in rats, and much additional research still needs to be done before the new treatment is available to humans."

It has long been known that "lower" animals, such as fish, can repair damaged fibers in the central nervous system – the spinal cord and the brain – and restore lost function. In contrast, mammals, including humans, can only repair injuries to the peripheral nerves, while injuries to the brain or spine leave them permanently paralyzed or otherwise handicapped.

The new approach is based on Schwartz's theory that states that the loss of this repair ability occurred in the course of evolution due to a unique relationship between the central nervous and the immune systems. More specifically, Schwartz believes this loss was probably dictated by the need to protect the mammalian brain from the effects of the immune system.

While immune cells normally help to heal damaged tissue, their access to the brain would disrupt the complex and dynamic neuronal networks that build up during an individual's lifetime.

Generally, when tissue damage occurs, immune cells known as macrophages swarm to the injured site where they remove damaged cells and release substances that promote healing. The central nervous system of mammals is different in this regard. When damaged, it is not effectively assisted by the immune system.

Schwartz's team discovered that this is because the mammalian central nervous system has a mechanism that suppresses the macrophages. As a result, macrophages are recruited to central nervous system injuries at a lower rate, and those that are recruited fail to become optimally activated and effective.

These findings led to a series of experiments with rats in the course of which the researchers managed to overcome the limited ability of the damaged central nervous system to recruit and activate the macrophages. They isolated macrophages and incubated them in a test tube in the presence of a damaged peripheral nerve. The macrophages, which received the distress signals of the damaged peripheral nerve, became activated.

At this stage, the researchers returned the activated macrophages to the damaged site in the central nervous system of the paralyzed rat. The transplanted macrophages created a growth-inducing environment around the damaged tissue. As a result of the treatment, the rats were able to regain partial motor activity in their previously paralyzed legs. They were able to move their hind legs and several animals were even able to place their weight upon them.

A major innovative aspect of such treatment lies in promoting the animal's own self-repair mechanism. In fact, the new treatment offers the option of using the animal's own cells for this purpose.

Further research is necessary to see if this approach will work in "higher" animals, such as humans.

Israel & the Jewish World

News analysis

Israel not as isolated as it seems

By MOSHE ZAK
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

Residents of Tel Aviv stood amazed last week at the display of friendship taking place overhead, when planes from the air forces of the United States, Ukraine, France, Turkey, Italy, the Czech Republic, Chile, Switzerland, Spain and Britain helped mark the jubilee of the Israel Air Force.

All year round, we are reminded of Israel's appalling isolation, and here were planes from 10 countries saluting Israel on its jubilee.

Votes in the UN are depressing. They create an inaccurate impression that Israel is alone and isolated and has no friends. The fact is that the parliamentary games in the UN don't reflect Israel's real status in the world, not even when as occurred this week, the vote is 124-4 in favor of the PLO.

The vote of the United States, which stands by Israel, counts as much as 100 votes supporting the PLO. By not being frightened of supporting Israel against the majority in the General Assembly, the United States strengthens Israel's position in the international arena. Many countries deduce from this consistent support that strengthening bilateral links with Israel is likely to put them into Washington's good graces.

Israel's position isn't measured by who supports it in the UN. It is determined by the various common interests that it shares with different countries.

Not a week goes by without distinguished figures visiting Jerusalem – presidents, prime ministers, foreign ministers and others. No sooner had we said good-bye to the Swiss president then the Spanish prime minister arrived, and even before he had finished his official visit, the head of NASA was here. He had hardly finished his announcement of closer cooperation with Israel, including the launching of the first Israeli astronaut, when the Turkish foreign minister arrived.

It's inertia that makes us go on bemoaning Israel's isolation and making black jokes about Micronesia being our only friend. I don't know how the Kazakhstan delegation voted in the General Assembly, but I'm sure that the agreements Industry and Trade Minister Natan Sharansky signed with the government of Kazakhstan are more important.

We stood this week on the lawn of the American ambassador's villa in Herzliya, at the Fourth of July celebrations, and heard his speech – in faultless Hebrew – on the complex structure of cooperation between the United States and Israel, including numerous joint projects.

This cast a completely different light on the headlines describing Israel's increasing isolation. We heard the ambassador describe President Bill Clinton's personal support for Israel, and we remembered Clinton's last letter promising that he wouldn't press Israel to make concessions in matters concerning its security. That letter, sent to the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, caused no stir in the media here because it didn't fit the gloomy predictions of the politicians and commentators who are talking about an American ultimatum, soon to be presented to Israel, to force the second redeployment in Samaria.

It's true that Netanyahu didn't call Clinton during the recent standoff in Gaza. But a call to Clinton because several Palestinian trucks were being held up would have been totally unnecessary. We needn't have feared that Clinton wouldn't have responded because of the delay in the 13 percent pullback, but let's face it: The U.S. president doesn't have to be bothered every time there is any kind of incident between Israel and the Palestinians.

We should welcome the fact that the United States stood by us in this week's UN vote in spite of the differences of opinion regarding the second redeployment. The United States not only voted against the proposal, but also persuaded the European Union to remove the PLO's central demands from the proposed resolution. The PLO delegation is still an observer and has not received the status of "almost a state." It did not win the right to be elected to key positions in the institutions of the UN and its agencies. The PLO delegation will not sit with the delegations from the member states in the UN assembly. It will remain with the observers. The Palestinian delegation has gotten certain elements of flattery, but it did not get what it really wanted.

In Israel's 49 years of UN membership it has never been elected to the Security Council or to chair any UN committees. This is because it doesn't belong to any of the UN blocs. The original proposal on the PLO included granting them the right to elect and be elected to various offices. The United States saw to it that the Europeans removed this clause in the proposal, too.

So it would be out of place to moan at the majority kowtowing to the PLO. Those voting for this week's proposal included countries with which we have close diplomatic and military ties.

On the other hand, it would be equally out of place to celebrate the PLO's lack of success, because the struggle is not over. Israel must remain alert in the face of Palestinian maneuvers as May 4, 1999 draws nearer. May 4 is the date by which the final settlement under the Oslo Accords was to have been completed.

One of things they tried was the French and Egyptian initiative to convene an international conference on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, with the participation of all the countries in the region except Israel.

The initiative put Israel in the same class as the Palestinians, who also wouldn't participate in the conference.

The attempt to upgrade the PLO in the UN didn't succeed; now we face an attempt to downgrade Israel to the same status as the PLO. This is also a plot that must be foiled in good time.

The most important thing, though, is not to panic. Despite what many think, the whole world is not against us. We have important and powerful friends.

Jewish boxing pioneer inducted into Hall of Fame

By DAVID BEZMOZGIS
Special to The CJN

CANASTOGA, N.Y. — On a rainy Sunday in June, Joseph B. Choynski (pronounced Cohenski), the first great American Jewish boxer, was inducted into the International Boxing Hall of Fame.

Known also as Little Joe and The California Terror, Choynski was born into a middle-class San Francisco family on Nov. 8, 1868, and after a successful amateur run as West Coast champion, Joe – to the disappointment of his mother – turned professional in 1888.

Choynski's professional career, from 1888 to 1904, spanned the transition era between bare-knuckle fighting and the modern Marquis of Queensberry rules. It was a tough time to be a boxer – prizefighting being essentially outlawed throughout most of the United States – and bouts were often staged in secret locations to evade authorities.

It was also a time in which San Francisco was one of pugilism's great cities: home to the likes of James J. Jeffries, Abe Attel, and Choynski's cross-town rival, "Gentleman" Jim Corbett. Choynski and Corbett's legendary 27-round fight on a barge in the Carquinez Straits in Benicia, California on June 5, 1889 is still regarded by ring experts as one of the all-time classic moments in boxing history. Corbett won the marathon fight, but broke both hands in the effort.

At 168 lbs., too big to be a middle-weight, Choynski spent his career regularly matched against men who outweighed him by 30 lbs. or more and relied on a scientific style of slugging to defeat his opponents. This is not to say he couldn't hit. Jack Johnson, first black heavyweight champion of the world and third round victim of a Choynski haymaker in 1901, once called Joe "the hardest hitter pound for pound" he had ever faced.

"He was among the early Jewish heroes of the gloved era," said Herbert Goldman, editor-in-chief of the International Boxing Digest and awards presenter at the Hall of Fame.

What was it like to be a Jewish practitioner of the sweet science at the turn of the century? Goldman suggested it wasn't too bad. "In boxing, ethnicity was something they used. Boxing celebrated differences socially and commercially – especially commercially."

Boxing was always a fringe sport in which there was traditionally a lot of Jewish participation in the form of combatants, managers, trainers and promoters. In that respect, Choynski, as a Jew, did not suffer the kind of discrimination encountered by black fighters, Goldman suggested.

Hank Kaplan, noted boxing historian and chronicler of the lives of some 5,000 Jewish pugilists, said "being a Jew didn't make him a better boxer or a lesser boxer." According to the historians, Choynski probably experienced more friction at home regarding his career than he ever did in the professional sphere.

Prior to the finalization of

Joseph B. Choynski

Choynski's election to the Hall, controversy arose concerning his credentials. Long-regarded as "the greatest heavyweight never to win a title," a case was made to support the fact that Choynski actually was a title-holder. Goldman and others recognized Choynski as the first legitimate light-heavyweight champion of the world.

Previously, Jack Root had been acknowledged as the original light-heavyweight champion, but Goldman maintained that Choynski's 1899 decision over Australian Jimmy Ryan in Dubuque earned him the vacant light-heavyweight crown.

"The light-heavyweight title was lightly regarded at the time," explained Goldman. "The reason he wasn't acknowledged as light-heavyweight champ was probably because he didn't push to make a big deal out of it."

Since most of Choynski's career took place at the turn of the century, documentation of his ring exploits is not always easy to come by; consequently, certain myths and rumors have arisen regarding his career. One story attributes Choynski with the invention of the left hook. The origin of this myth stems from Choynski's barge fight with Corbett; however Goldman and Kaplan contested that idea.

"Choynski may have helped to perfect [the left hook]," said Kaplan, "but I wouldn't say he invented it."

Another story credits Choynski with the instruction of a young Jack Johnson on the subtler points of the fight game while the two were jailed together in the same cell for 21 days after their "illegal" Feb. 25, 1901 Galveston match. This story is accepted as much more credible.

After his retirement from boxing in 1904, Choynski remained active in the sport. He was a sparring partner and second for Jim Jeffries in his July 4, 1910 bout against Jack Johnson in Reno, Nevada. He was also the instructor at the Pittsburgh Athletic Club, worked in insurance, and schooled young boxers in Cincinnati, where he died on Jan. 24, 1943 at the age of 74.

As is tradition for the induction ceremony at the International Boxing Hall of Fame, deceased members are the first to be inducted. Herbert Goldman read out the names of the boxers and included a short summary of their achievements. On hand, under the shelter of tents, were several hundred boxing fans. On stage, were the inductees, and boxing alumni such as Lou Duva, Matthew Saad Muhammad, Joe Frazier, and Marvin Hagler.

Choynski was the first inducted in the Old-Timers category. Goldman listed his accomplishments and then a ceremonial ring-bell was struck in the boxer's honor. It is customary in the case of deceased members to present their certificates to a surviving relative. No surviving relative was found for Choynski.

The Inside Back

By JORDAN MAX

I'd been hearing rumors lately about wild bnei/bnot mitzvah parties being the norm, so disguised as a waiter, and armed only with my wits, a note pad and a $50,000 local Federation Continuity grant, I went undercover to investigate. (Before I forget, I would like to take this opportunity to again apologize to the lady at table 5 at the Finkelstein simchah for the spilled soup). My report is as follows:

Last Laugh

Methodology: At first, it was necessary to verify that the bar/bat mitzvah celebration I was attending was not in fact a wedding or a three-ring circus. Judging by the volume of food and other expenses, it's definitely getting harder to tell them apart. Perhaps the key difference is that only one family is crying.

I'm not sure whether the extravagances are due to the need to keep up with the Cohenses, the search for novelty, or whether kids are maturing faster these days and the parents wish to economize by staging the bar/bat mitzvah and wedding in one evening.

However, I am sure that these hypotheses will no doubt require further careful study and an additional continuity grant. After conducting my extensive field research, I conducted in-depth ethnographic library research. Although not entirely complete, I am pleased to share some preliminary findings on some modern customs.

Findings: Let me first comment on the typical setup for a modern-day bar/bat mitzvah celebration. It would appear the prevailing custom is to have a shaman/priest figure called a DJ who appears to be in control of the entire proceedings – sound, light and pyrotechnics systems. This individual is able to modify group behaviour at will. The closest historical parallel appears to be that of the service of the Kohen Gadol and the Levi'im in the Mishkan and Beit Hamikdash, thus deliberately emphasizing the bar/bat mitzvah family's wish that the Third Temple be speedily rebuilt in our days.

At the proper moment, the bar/bat mitzvah child appears, escorted in grand style, supported on human shoulders, pillows or elephant, and all honored guests then pay homage to him or her.

The child then dismounts and engages in a ritualistic, costumed dance of some complexity, which I am told takes more time to memorize than the Haftorah itself. This ritual appears to be reminiscent of how King David danced joyfully before the Aron Kodesh as it was moved from Shiloh to Jerusalem.

On occasion, there are shapely and somewhat clad female dancers who appear to entice the celebrants to join them. This could only be a veiled reference to the ancient custom of Tu B'Av, a day in which unmarried Jerusalem maidens would borrow each other's plain white dresses and dance in the vineyards in order to find husbands. This obviously represents a family wish that the bar/bat mitzvah be married as soon as possible and move out of the house.

Another custom I have noted consists of crooning by a pudgy, sideburned and sequin-covered individual, called an Elvis impersonator. This is obviously a reference to a desire for the resurrection of the dead (see Third Temple above). In a similar vein, at some point in the celebration, the bar/bat mitzvah takes a hammer- type device and proceeds to smash to smithereens a hollowed out cake. Note the similarity to the custom of the groom breaking the glass underfoot to commemorate the destruction of the Temples.

Clearly, one of the most widely enjoyed customs involves a group dance, which is led by multiple leaders utilizing elaborate hand movements. This song, entitled It's Fun to Shvitz at the YMHA is clearly reminiscent of the duchaning of Birkat Cohanim, or priestly blessing recited in synagogues on yamim tovim.

Conclusion: Preliminary findings indicate that these supposedly new widespread customs are indeed re-discovered ancient rituals, intended to reflect deep-seated spiritual yearnings of the bar/bat mitzvah celebrant's family. Further study of these phenomena is definitely required.

About Teens

Dear Karilani,

My parents have been giving me an allowance of $5 a week. Since the summer started, I have been going out a lot more and I feel like the $5 is not enough. I don't want to ask my parents for more money, but I don't think I can have a fun summer if I have to restrict myself to where I go and how much I spend. I'm only 14, so I can't get a job at a real store, but I wanted to know how else I could make money for myself.

Strapped for Cash

Dear Strapped for Cash,

If you don't want to ask your parents for a bigger allowance, then doing odd jobs is the best way to make extra money. In your neighborhood, there are probably lots of opportunities to walk dogs, mow lawns or babysit. Let your neighbors know that you are a very responsible person who would love to help them and make some money at the same time.

If, however, there are no jobs around your neighborhood, you can always speak to your parents about doing jobs around the house and getting paid for them. If your garage is a mess and needs cleaning, you could volunteer to clean it up and get paid for doing that.

You can also do a lot of things for the community with your friends, like selling lemonade or having a carwash. Sit down with a bunch of friends and get some ideas!

Also, if you want to save money, there are many ways to do that. Rent a movie instead of going to the theatre, eat at home instead of eating out and take the bus instead of a taxi.

You can also try to budget your money at the beginning of each week to see where and how you will spend it. If you cannot seem to make ends meet and really need some more cash, than you may have to talk to your parents and seriously discuss getting a small raise in your allowance.

Karilani is a composite name for three girls, who are close friends and in Grade 11 in Toronto

ICC receives qualified support

Critics argue Israel targeted by politicization of treaty creating criminal court

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Creation of an International Criminal Court (ICC) to prosecute war crimes was greeted with qualified approval by Canadian Jewish groups and unqualified disapproval by the State of Israel, thanks to a provision that appeared to be directed specifically at the Jewish state.

The provision defines a war crime to include the transfer of populations to and from occupied territories. It was introduced to the treaty as a result of pressure from Arab states led by Egypt and Syria, thereby politicizing the court, Israeli government officials asserted.

In objecting to the provision, the Israeli delegation to the UN conference that drew up the treaty in Rome said it "fails to comprehend why it has been considered to insert into the list of the most heinous and grievous war crimes the action of transferring population into occupied territory."

Canadian Jewish groups adopted a similar view, arguing the politically motivated agenda of Arab countries undermines the court's credibility.

The disputed provision "is a perversion of the concept of international criminality and will severely, perhaps fatally, undermine the effectiveness and credibility of the ICC," said Moshe Ronen, president of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC). "The ICC should be a court of law and not another vehicle for countries to play out political disputes that should be resolved by negotiation. The provision must be amended."

"To place the Jewish presence in the territories on the same moral plane as genocide and ethnic cleansing in Rwanda and Bosnia is not only offensive but undermines any credibility a permanent war crimes tribunal could hold within the international community," said Brian Morris, national chair of the Canada-Israel Committee, the Jewish community's lobby group on Israel.

"While we, along with Israel, support the idea of the ICC in principle, we are disturbed that the UN conference establishing the court has politicized the issue by bowing to Arab pressure," Morris said.

Tisha b'Av in Warsaw ghetto

By LARRY DOMNITCH
Special to The CJN

On July 22, the eve of Tisha b'Av 1942, the death sentence for Warsaw's Jews was issued.

In the early morning hours, the Judenrat was convened and the Plenipotentiary for Resettlement Affairs ordered the "resettlement in the east of all Jews residing in Warsaw regardless of age and sex." The order called for 6,000 Jews per day to be rounded up and deported.

When Warsaw was placed under siege by the Germans in September 1939, its Jewish Council appointed Adam Czerniakow as mayor of the ghetto. As head of the Judenrat, Czerniakow attempted to assist the many starving and destitute of Warsaw and defended Warsaw's Jews, often at risk to his own life.

Czerniakow always kept a tablet of cyanide with him in the event the Nazis asked him to obey an order he felt he had to refuse. His despair at the plight of the children of the ghetto tormented him.

On June 14, 1942, he wrote in his diary: "I commanded that the children be brought to the garden from the detention room, organized by the local Ordnungsdienst. They are living skeletons, street beggars ... I'm ashamed to admit it's been long since I cried so ... Cursed are those among us who eat and drink and forget these children."

Dominican Republic Lauded

JERUSALEM — At a special Israel Council on Foreign Relations meeting in Jerusalem recently, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) joined other leaders in paying tribute to the Dominican Republic on the 60th anniversary of the Evian Conference.

CJC president Moshe Ronen and national executive director Jack Silverstone recalled how 31 countries convened at the French resort town in July 1938 to discuss sanctuary for Jews fleeing Nazi Germany and Austria. However, they point out, the Dominican Republic stood out among the rest and agreed to accept a significant number of immigrants.

Best Wishes to King

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu wished Jordan's King Hussein a "full and speedy recovery" after the monarch disclosed that he was being treated for suspected lymphatic cancer. Netanyahu told Israel Radio that he spoke in the name of all Israelis, who, he said, "value the important and courageous steps the king has taken over the years in relations with us."

Vote on Bill Postponed

JERUSALEM — A Knesset member recently decided to postpone a vote on a bill that would impose fines on businesses that remain open on the Sabbath. Hanan Porat, a member of the National Religious Party and chair of the Knesset Law Committee, reached the decision after seeing that the bill lacked the necessary support. Haredi Jews demonstrated recently to protest a restaurant that remained open on Sabbath.

Court Hears Petition

JERUSALEM — The Supreme Court agreed to hear a petition to recognize as Jewish adopted children who were converted by the country's Conservative movement. The hearings were delayed to allow a government-appointed commission time to reach a compromise. The petition was originally submitted three years ago by the Conservative movement and by the Na'amat women's organization.

He is credited with having negotiated to establish diplomatic relations between India and Israel.

McLellan and Robillard Commended

MONTREAL — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) has commended Federal Justice Minister Anne McLellan and Immigration Minister Lucienne Robillard following the recent release of the first annual report detailing the activities of their Inter-Departmental War Crimes Unit.

"Such a report was a long time in coming," said CJC war crimes committee chair, Prof. Irving Abella. "We are pleased with the determination and vigor demonstrated by the War Crimes Unit in its accomplishments to date. The commitment by the government to allocate additional resources over the next three years to bring to justice at least 13 new suspects demonstrates the new-found determination to finally root out the evil of Nazi murderers in our midst."

The report noted that there may be up to 400 modern-day war criminals present in Canada.

CJC national executive director and general counsel Jack Silverstone said, "This document gives a warning to contemporary war criminals that Canada will not tolerate their presence among us. The War Crimes Unit may be assured of our cooperation in its efforts to rid Canada of this criminal element."

War crimes program gets substantial funding boost

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canada's program to bring war criminals to justice received a shot in the arm last week when federal officials announced that $46.8 million would be allocated over three years to units investigating Nazi-era and modern-day war criminals.

The bulk of the funds – over $30 million – will go towards departments investigating modern-day war criminals, while approximately $12 million is earmarked for the effort against Nazi-era criminals, said Paul Vickery, head of the Justice Department's Nazi war crimes unit. At $4 million per year, the new funding is roughly double the Nazi war crime unit's previous budget, he added.

The enhanced funding will allow the unit to bring forward 14 new cases, bringing to 29 the number of cases launched against Nazi suspects since 1995.

The announcement came less than a week after Canada and 120 other nations agreed at a United Nations conference in Rome to create an International Criminal Court.

Vickery acknowledged there was a connection between events in Rome, where Canada was among the leaders pushing for a world court, and the domestic scene.

"In recent years, the government has seen the need to react definitively regarding war crimes and crimes against humanity because we've seen a growth" in conflicts around the world, he said. "I think the ministers of Justice and Citizenship and Immigration are very much alive to the need to take strong steps in this area."

In addition to the funding changes, the federal government has proposed:

• creating closer ties, though not a merger, between the modern and Nazi war crimes units;

• revamping the Extradition Act to permit extraditions to the court in The Hague trying Yugoslav war crimes cases. A bill to that effect was tabled in parliament and will be debated in the fall;

• amending the Criminal Code to overcome legal obstacles to criminal prosecutions that resulted from a Supreme Court of Canada ruling in the Imre Finta case.

Jewish organizations applauded the government's new initiative.

"It's a step forward. It's a shot across the bow of war criminals that Canada is no longer a haven as it has been for 50 years," said Irving Abella, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress' war crimes committee.

"The 14 new cases represent an almost exponential growth... It bodes well for the future," he said.

"I'm extremely pleased," said Sol Littman, Canadian representative of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre. "But it indicates how badly they lied to us in previous years, particularly during the Mulroney period, when we asked if they had enough money and staff and they said, 'We have enough money, enough staff.' Obviously it wasn't true."

"We are pleased" with the steps taken by government, said B'nai Brith Canada spokesperson David Matas. "B'nai Brith Canada has long called on the government to increase the war crimes units' human and financial resources. It is now clear... that the lack of resources was a major cause of serious delay in the commencement of proceedings against suspected war criminals."

Vickery discounted suggestions that the unit was hamstrung by budgetary restrictions. "In the past, we've been able to find the money. There hasn't been a formal funding arrangement, but funding was always there when we brought cases forward," he said.

In other developments, the Justice and Citizenship departments broke new ground with the release of a public report titled Canada's War Crimes Program.

The report indicated that since 1987, the Justice Department and the RCMP have investigated 1,571 individuals as possible Nazi war crimes suspects. Ninety files remain active, 15 proceedings have been initiated, 280 files are considered inactive and 880 files have been closed.

Turning to modern day war criminals, the report indicated "there are close to 320 suspects in Canada."

Vickery said the enhanced funding will help the modern war crimes unit increase its staff and beef up security in ports abroad.

"We want to prevent people from entering in the first place and so we want to beef up screening abroad," he said.

Katriuk's fate in judge's hands

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The future fate of a Montrealer accused of concealing his wartime activities to enter Canada in 1951 will not rest on whether he actually collaborated with the Nazis, the federal judge in the case said during final arguments last month.

Federal Judge Marc Nadon said that Vladimir Katriuk's ability to keep his Canadian citizenship will be determined by one and only one question: whether there exists a preponderance of evidence showing that he was asked by Canadian immigration officials in France what he did during the war.

"If he was asked, and gave a false answer, that will be enough," Nadon said on July 3 as lawyers for Katriuk and the Crown wrapped up their arguments respectively in favor of letting Katriuk, 76, keep his Canadian citizenship and denaturalizing him.

If Nadon concludes that there is enough evidence to show that Katriuk was indeed asked but that he concealed his activities, he will be stripped of his citizenship, and then deported back to Ukraine.

Nadon is expected to rule on the case in August.

The former butcher, now an Ormstown beekeeper, did not attend the two days of final arguments in Federal Court, where his lawyers portrayed Katriuk as a man of good character who hid his identity when applying to enter Canada only because he had deserted from the French Foreign Legion and did not want to get caught.

The Crown's lawyer, David Lucas, on the other hand, contended that in the post-war years, asking potential immigrants about their past was Canadian screening policy, and that Katriuk had to have lied to gain entry.

Katriuk has admitted to having been a member of a Ukrainian battalion in 1942 that was taken over by the Germans in Belarus and which later became part of a larger Waffen SS unit implicated in acts of atrocities against the civilian population.

But Katriuk has vehemently denied taking part in any such activities, acknowledging only that he served as a guard and protected villagers from partisan looting.

Katriuk denied ever being in locations where the battalion was implicated directly in the deaths of thousands of civilians, including Jews.

During Katriuk's trial, his lawyers said Ottawa investigators, if they wanted to get Katriuk for war crimes, should have pursued him on that front, not for coming to Canada under a false name.

As the lawyers argued in the final days in court, it appeared unclear the extent to which the Crown had reached the level of evidence needed to strip Katriuk of his citizenship.

Katriuk's recollection of his wartime activities and immigration process, at least in his testimony, was sketchy. He vowed, however, that he never witnessed any mistreatment of the civilian population and that he was never asked by immigration authorities what he did during the war.

Moreover, Katriuk, after becoming a Canadian citizen in 1958, voluntarily advised Canadian officials that he came to Canada under a false name but was allowed to retain his citizenship. Key documents relating to Katriuk's admission process – including his actual application form – were destroyed in the late 1950s as part of a general housecleaning.

For Katriuk's lawyers, the absence of such a form, in tandem with what they say was the Canadian priority at that time to look out for "black marketeers, criminals and prostitutes," demonstrates that in all likelihood Katriuk was allowed in after it was established that he was none of the above.

Lucas has said that while there is no evidence linking Katriuk directly with atrocities, such activities can be inferred by his having been a member of an operational task force known to have committed war crimes.

From the editor's desk

Cheeky and ill-advised

In the last column I commented on how "editorial writers seldom restrain themselves when condemning the policies of the Netanyahu government".

And when not condemning Israel, they appear equally unrestrained in offering the Jewish country unsolicited foreign policy advice, no doubt after extensive consultation with the battery of Middle East foreign policy experts on their respective editorial staffs and advisory boards, and no doubt, of course, well-intended.

The editorialist was responding to the launch by Iran last week of a form of prototype of the Shahab 3 missile. The missile had a range of 1,300 kilometres, bringing within its potential deadly reach, cities in Israel, Jordan, Saudi Arabia, Turkey, and even parts of Russia and the Ukraine.

"The Administration ought to devote some attention to reassuring Israel, which considers Iran its most dangerous enemy and feels newly vulnerable. Syria already has missiles capable of reaching Israel; Iraqi Scuds did so during the gulf war, and now Iran may soon pose a missile threat.

"The immediate dangers facing Israel, however, have not substantially increased, and Israel should not act precipitously. (Our emphasis.) Iran's new missiles are not yet operational and Tehran remains at least five, and probably more, years away from developing nuclear weapons. That allows some time for arms control and diplomacy. Israel can also improve its regional security by pursuing efforts to negotiate peace with the Palestinians."

To be fair to the editorial writer, the advice in the editorial is primarily directed, and properly so, to the American government. Moreover, the editorial does conclude with an aptly somber statement:"Iran's missile test is a warning of future danger that should not be ignored."

But even so, one cannot overlook the fact that the writer could not resist proffering the free advice that "Israel should not act precipitously." Of course, underlying the writer's admonition was the assumption that Israel would act precipitously, whatever that means in this context.

In this particular instance, having regard to the overall content and tone of the editorial and to the fact that the writer only mildly hectored Israel, the attitude was more amusing than galling. But in many more instances, the reverse is true.

To be sure, the launch of the missile and its strategic significance were undoubtedly intended by the leaders in Tehran to be noticed and understood not only in Israel and in the United States.

The Arab kingdoms and autocracies of the Gulf region are historical rivals of the Persian state. Thus, the flight of the Shahab is potentially threatening to Iran's Muslim rivals too.

But beyond any doubt, the gravest danger from Iran's missile test is faced by Israel and by its people.

* * *

In the same issue of the Times were three other news items emanating from Iran. They provide additional important background to better place the missile launch in an appropriate domestic context.

The mayor of Tehran, Gholamhossein Karabaschi, a close ally to the supposedly moderate president of Iran, Mohammed Khatami,was convicted of corruption charges. Karabaschi was sentenced to five years in prison and was barred from running for public office for 20 years.

The charges, the trial and the sentence were viewed by most observers as a successful attempt by the fundamentalist mullahs, who still wield most of the power in Iran, to strike at Khatami.

In a separate court ruling, the conservative, religious court ordered the closure of the newspaper, Jamayeh.

The newspaper too had been a voice on behalf of the president, publicly questioning the effectiveness of some of the policies of the older, rabidly-anti western ruling clerics.

Finally, more ominous indeed than the mayor's conviction and the newspaper's closure was the execution of Ruhollah Rowhani, 52 years-old, father of four, follower of Baha'i.

Rowhani had been charged and convicted of converting a Muslim to the Baha'i faith.

Baha'i derives from Islam but is regarded as high heresy by Iran's religious leaders. Since the Islamic revolution in 1979, more than 200 Baha'is in Iran have been executed on account of their faith.

The mullahs have been single-minded in their persecution of the Baha'is. According to the Times news report, "three additional executions are believed to be imminent."

When told of Rowhani's execution, the State Department in Washington, to its credit, issued the following statement: "We call on the government of Iran to protect the lives of the 15 other imprisoned Baha'is, seven of whom are sentenced to death on charges of apostasy and so-called Zionist (our emphasis) Baha'i activities."

I am unaware if Ottawa has issued a similarly unambiguous statement. If it has not, it should.

* * *

When fully pieced together, all of these Iran-related developments should give editorial writers considerable reason to pause before they deign to give Israel advice about the implications of the launch of the Shahab. Even so relatively mild a finger-wagging as "Israel should not act precipitously" is cheeky, presumptuous, and ill-advised in the circumstances. —MBD

Sudbury website ends links to extremist groups

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Sudbury-based Internet Web site has stopped offering links to white supremacist groups – and access to instructions to concoct the deadly biological agent Anthrax – after being taken to task by its Internet Service Providers (ISPs).

Northern Information Exchange, operated by Sudbury resident John Dwyer, altered the content of its Web site after one of its ISPs, ViaNet Internet Solutions, passed along complaints about the site's contents. The original complaint came from Sol Littman, Canadian representative of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre.

Littman was concerned about the content of Dwyer's Web site, which featured access to the Terrorist's Handbook, a recipe for making Anthrax, instructions to create a powerful electric cattle prod and "hyper-links" to Holocaust-denier Ernst Zundel, the Michigan Militia and to Freedomsite.

Following the complaint, ViaNet and a second Sudbury ISP, Cyber Beach Communications, on which Northern Information Exchange operated a mirror site, convinced Dwyer to remove the offensive material and links. (ViaNet and Cyber Beach provide access to the Internet for Northern Information Exchange.)

In an interview with The CJN, ViaNet owner Will Gasteiger said he approached the complaint about Dwyer's Web site as a "problem that had to be fixed." "We took a look at the situation and thought it wasn't really appropriate. We don't want to censor things, but if there's a problem, we have to look at it," Gasteiger said. "The material concerns me in that you don't want your service offending other people."

As to the Anthrax recipe and blueprint for the cattle prod, Gasteiger said "I guess it depends on how you see these things. People can look at it and decide if they want to look at it or not. "

The Internet "is all about self-regulation," he continued. "We're in the middle of trying to resolve it so that the client gets service and people are not offended."

Gasteiger said he shut down Dwyer's Web site until he could discuss the issue with him. Once Dwyer removed the offending elements his service was restored.

Littman pointed out that the Wiesenthal Centre has been investigating extremist Web sites for over a year "and we've been able to remove all the sites."

A Web site operated by Bernard Klatt of Oliver, B.C. that was hyperlinked to white supremacist web addresses was shut down recently, and in May, Interlog, a Toronto-based ISP, terminated the account of Marc Lemire, one of Zundel's employees.

Austria tops up compensation to Jewish victims of Nazism

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Austria is adding $12 million to an existing relief fund for victims of Nazism.

Jews of Austrian origin around the world, including Canada, who were bypassed by the current restitution fund launched in May 1995, may be eligible for a one-time payment of $8,500, said Wolfgang Spadinger, a senior diplomat at Austria's embassy in Ottawa, in an interview last week.

Spadinger, the embassy's minister counsellor, said that the Austrian parliament in Vienna is expected to pass a bill in the autumn modifying qualification criterion for the 3-year-old fund.

As part of its efforts to come to terms with its past, Austria established what is officially known as the national fund.

Its purpose is to compensate Austrian Jews forced to emigrate as a result of persecution by the Nazis following the 1938 Anschluss, Austria's absorption by Germany.

Before its annexation, Austria was home to some 180,000 Jews, of whom about 65,000 perished during the Holocaust.

To be eligible for the one-time payment, applicants had to have lived in Austria before March 13, 1938, the day it was taken over by Germany.

Applicants may live in Austria or outside Austria. So far, 21,000 of 30,000 applicants have succeeded in receiving the $8,500 payment, including an estimated 1,200 Austrian Jews residing in Canada.

"We are still getting incoming applications," said Spadinger. "Some people are unaware of this fund. They prefer not to be reminded of this period."

Others, he added, want no contact with Austria.

"We'd be delighted to help them," he declared.

The $12-million addition to the fund was made possible by an act of brazen robbery.

When the Wehrmacht occupied Austria 60 years ago last winter, snuffing out Austria's independence, the German government confiscated 78 tons of gold reserves stored in the Austrian National Bank in Vienna.

The gold was subsequently transferred to the German Reichsbank in Berlin.

After World War II, the victorious Allied forces set up the Tripartite Gold Commission, a special body whose mandate was to expedite the return of stolen gold to its rightful owners.

Recognizing Austria's claim to the gold the Nazis had looted, the Tripartite Gold Commission repatriated 50 tons of gold in several tranches to Austria.

According to Spadinger, the gold in question did not belong to Jews.

Then, as a result of an international conference held in London in December 1997 to deal with Nazi gold, Austria decided to channel approximately 100 million shillings, or $12 million, into its fund for the victims of National Socialism.

According to a report in the July 17 edition of the Jewish Chronicle, published in London, Austria intends to modify the conditions under which individuals can apply for compensation.

Under the new rules, the newspaper claims, a person who left Austria during or after July 1936 would now be eligible for a restitution payment.

Administrators of the fund concluded that forced emigration actually began in the summer of 1936 rather than in the wake of the Anschluss.

Spadinger cautioned that guidelines governing applicability have yet to be finalized.

Riverdale rallies behind youth

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Eight-year-old Aaron Weber would have enrolled in soccer and baseball camp this summer and battled his opponents on the playing field.

But the young sports enthusiast has been facing a much more serious challenge. For the last two months he has been fighting a brain tumor.

Aaron, who lives in the east-end community of Riverdale, was diagnosed with a rare type of brain tumor in May, his mother Isabel Weber told The CJN. "It was the worse nightmare of our life."

She said the Danforth Jewish Circle (DJC), rallied behind the family when news of Aaron's condition spread. "People were arriving with food and arranging babysitting the moment they found out. This community couldn't have been more responsive."

Two members of the DJC, Tanya Luder and Mara Cole, have also spearheaded a fundraising drive throughout the Riverdale community to cover the cost of alternative medicine or possible treatment in the United States. Their next fundraiser, a raffle, will culminate with a draw at 9:00 p.m. on Aug. 10 at the close of a three-day festival on the Danforth.

Luder noted that 20,000 tickets selling at $2 a piece are now available at several stores along Danforth Avenue, among them Korry's Clothiers, and several CIBC branches.

She added that during the festival, members of the DJC will work at raffle booths along the Danforth, and will help man a bouncing castle donated by Red Line Promotions.

Prizes donated include a weekend at Bayview Wildwood or Clevelands House; a Bell Mobility cellular phone; four Skybox tickets and meals from Ford Canada; and in-line skates from Sporting Life.

Cole, who has worked on behalf of the family since she heard the news, said raising money was the best way for her to help out. This kind of illness strikes so randomly, it could have happened to anybody, she said. "As easily as it was the Webers it could have been my family. It's so scary."

She was instrumental in getting the Withrow Ball Hockey Association to donate $3,000, the proceeds of a silent auction, and she helped organize a party at Il Fornello on the Danforth which netted $6,400.

Along with a $2,000 donation from the Big Carrot and $4,500 from the parents and the PTA of Withrow School where Aaron is a student, close to $16,000 has been raised so far.

Cole has also contacted corporations to donate services: The Marriott Hotel and the Crown Plaza will be providing rooms for the Weber family for roughly a month during the course of Aaron's alternative therapy in Montreal.

One of Cole's biggest coups was getting tickets for the recent Spice Girl concert. She was told through the Children's Wish Foundation that the tickets were unavailable, but she persisted, with corporations like CHUM, and Molson's Amphitheatre, she said.

"I knew Aaron wanted to hear the Spice Girls...A senior vice-president of public relations at Molson's put out the notice and [another] vice-president gave up his tickets. The Amphitheatre was incredible. They gave the family VIP treatment."

As for Aaron, he was thrilled with the Spice Girls, according to his mother. She said his attitude has been excellent throughout the two month course of radiation which ended recently. "He responded very well to radiation. It can be a hit or miss."

She noted that Aaron was wheelchair bound before the treatment and although he gets tired easily, he can now walk without assistance.

The hospital staff was "amazed" at how well he handled radiation Weber said. "Aaron is the most amazing patient. They said they couldn't have had a more agreeable child. He's such a trouper."

For more information, call 466-3535, or write Mara Cole, 101 Withrow Ave. Toronto, M4K 1C8.

New day school offers European style education

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The newest day school in the city also has a new philosophy.

One-year-old Ohr Menachem Academy works like a European school, says principal Henya Schechter, demanding the highest standards academically and behaviorally, offering an enriched curriculum, and stressing maths, sciences and physical education.

School founder Rabbi Yoseph Zaltzman, rabbi and executive director of the Jewish Russian Community Centre (JRCC), told The CJN that the school was started because of the perception, particularly in the Russian community, that the education given by the day schools is inferior to that of both public and secular private schools.

"Less than 10 percent of Russian Jewish children receive any form of Jewish education. We realized that if we opened a school with higher standards and an academically enriched program, with a good sports program too, it would attract [children from that community]," Rabbi Zaltzman said.

Ohr Menachem is by no means solely for Russian children. "We will accept any Jewish child willing and able to meet our high academic and behavior standards. Their current level of knowledge and practice is not a barrier," the rabbi added.

In September, the school will consist of grades 1 and 2, although the intention is to eventually go up to Grade 8, or even Grade 12.

"We didn't feel the time was right to open a preschool too, as the JRCC preschool is in the same area," said Schechter.

Schechter is very conscious of the difficulties many youngsters have in day schools, especially with Hebrew subjects. "Many are turned off – Judaic studies become a torture, especially when the Hebrew language becomes demanding," she said.

For this reason, teaching of Judaic studies will be in English, although students will learn the original texts.

"The children will be taught basic skills and knowledge in a meaningful and enjoyable manner," Schechter said. There will be as much "hands-on" learning as possible, such as lighting the menorah on Chanukah or visiting a kosher supermarket.

"We want to instil pride in being Jewish," Rabbi Zaltzman said. "We want them to relate well to their Jewish identity."

Schechter added that the school also wants to "make a child a mensch, to teach manners. We are not ashamed to tell a child that this is not the way [to behave]."

Heavy stress will be put on maths and sciences. The aim is to give the students "the ability to internalize the material, to analyse, think and express themselves," Schechter said. "We think it is important to learn to think independently and logically, before learning by heart."

Students are bused to a nearby gymnasium for physical education. Computers are being installed in both classrooms, and not only will the children learn how to use them easily and competently, but the computers will be integrated into the curriculum.

French will begin in Grade 2, but Schechter wants to add a 15-minute introduction to the language in Grade 1.

Rabbi Zaltzman said the school hopes to add other languages in the future, such as Yiddish, Russian, conversational Hebrew, and a more intense level of French.

Another novel feature of Ohr Menachem Academy is its extracurricular program, two hours after school from Monday to Thursday. Programs include art, instructional chess, science and technology (where every week students will build a model based on a principle of physics), homework help and music.

While the program is optional, "last year, all the students took part," Rabbi Zaltzman noted.

The school is run by three boards – a board of governors that handles finances and physical matters; a board of education that overseas curriculum and policies; and a board of rabbis to deal with Judaic and halachic matters.

For the coming year, classes will be held at 44 Edinburgh, in the Bathurst-Wilson area. Transportation is available. Tuition includes a hot lunch and snacks.

Woman seeks her Jewish family

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In the second week of August 1943, a 1-year-old baby was left at the monastery of the Salwatorian Brothers in Trzebinia, near Krakow, Poland. A woman from Sosnowiec had asked permission to leave the child for an hour.

She never returned.

A parcel of baby clothes addressed to Baby Wanda Zakrzewska, believed to be a code name, arrived at the monastery 10 days later, but the ghettos at Bedzin and Sosnowiec had already been liquidated.

Today the Polish woman who was that baby, Wanda Chmielewska of Lublin, is anxiously seeking her Jewish family and has appealed to The CJN for help.

Three years ago, Chmielewska, 56, now married and a grandmother, learned by chance that she was Jewish. As a baby, she had been adopted by a Polish family, relatives of a priest who arranged the adoption.

She was never told, for instance, that a couple from a Jewish agency named Kehila had made repeated visits to the family in 1946 and were turned away empty-handed. They did not even see the baby.

Wanda Chmielewska

She lived with the family until she was 18, not learning until age 11 that she was adopted, and she never knew she had been left at the monastery until three years ago, when she heard from Father Pablaczyk, now 80, who had seen her at the monastery where he was a priest.

"She is more at peace with herself since she began to research her Jewish roots," her daughter, Dorota Chmielewska, 32, told The CJN by phone from Lublin. "She knows now who she is, that she is Jewish. Before she didn't know it."

Wanda also has a son, Robert, 33.

Six other Polish women who are now attempting to discover their Jewish roots met with members of March of the Living on their trip to Poland.

Anyone with information for Wanda Chmielewska is asked to contact Nathan Leipciger at 416-445-8255.

Another plea to help Wanda came from documentary filmmaker Mira Reym Binford, of New Haven, Conn., who met her in Poland recently.

"She is a wonderful, quiet woman who is desperately anxious to know something about her family," Binford said.

Binford made Diamonds in the Snow, a documentary shown on PBS in 1995, about three babies, including herself, who were hidden by Polish families.

Set an example

We agree with the decision last week by the Conference of Presidents of Major Jewish Organizations (CPMJO) to send Yasser Arafat a personal letter urging him to publicly denounce the frequently recurring denials of the Holocaust appearing in the Palestinian media and uttered by Palestinian officials.

The appeal by the Conference leaders was in response to an article in the July 2 issue of Al Hayat al Jadida, the publication regarded by most well-informed observers as the official newspaper of the Palestinian Authority (PA), in which the Holocaust was described as a "deceitful myth." The author of the article claimed that Jews had distributed "frightful pictures of mass executions and invented the shocking story of the gas ovens, where Hitler allegedly burned them."

The article is not only an affront to truth and to decency, it is a stumbling block to the development of a new, more trusting relationship between Israelis and Palestinians. Thus it is ultimately also a deep danger to the possibility of peace between the two peoples.

In their letter to Chairman Arafat, the Jewish leaders asked him "to denounce this historical revisionism and declare as unacceptable all written or oral denigration and diminution of the Holocaust."

The CJN joins their plea. We urge Arafat to act quickly and assertively. He must unambiguously state on the record that such opinions are odious, false and dangerous. He must set for his people an example of a leader for whom the truth is essential both as a building block in the structure of reconciliation between Israeli and Palestinian and for its own sake, in its own right.

It is not only Jewish leadership that seeks a strong response from Chairman Arafat. The New York Times reported that American officials are also deeply perturbed by continuous Holocaust denial by Palestinians. "These sorts of issues come up unfortunately all too frequently," (our emphasis) a State Department official said. "And when they do, we repeat the view to the Palestinian Authority that it's got to stop."

The issue is not one of freedom of the press as Hanan Ashrawi, PA minister for higher education and research, disingenuously claimed. The CPMJO letter did not ask Arafat to prohibit the offensive opinion from being published. Rather it asked him to denounce and condemn it for having been published.

The issue is one of truth, of trying to build trust between two increasingly distrustful peoples and of trying to lay a foundation for a durable peace between them.

Conscience cries

We have seen the photos before. Each time they tear at our hearts and sear our souls until conscience must cry out. They are the emaciated, skeletal, distorted bodies of the poor, pitiful starving masses in East Africa. They are the children who are barely recognizable as children; and they are the adults, gaunt, hollow-cheeked, nearly lifeless, who try desperately to feed their children but cannot, or try to lift their own arms, but cannot.

Once again there is famine in the southern Sudan and as many as 50 people are dying each day. The United Nations estimates that more than one million human beings are at risk of not surviving the year because of lack of food. Because this latest famine stems not only from the malevolence of nature but from the malevolence of man as well, it will not be easily remedied. Nevertheless, a remedy must be found. We cannot stand idly by the deaths of our fellow human beings. We therefore call upon the government of Canada to take every possible step to mobilize international opinion and international resources to try to prevent any more people in Sudan from dying of hunger.

Holocaust compensation to Romanian survivors

Regarding the article about the compensation plan (CJN, July 8), I fail to understand why the Romanian Holocaust survivors who were incarcerated in forced military labor battalions in Southern Moldavia and Bessarabia are not eligible.

Hundreds of Jews from Romanian towns like Falticeni, Botosani, Iassy were deported for over 20 months to forced labor camps in inhuman conditions, without access to the outside world.

The camps were situated in quarries, isolated, at considerable distances from places known as Calfa, Alexandreni, Doaga. They were surrounded by barbed wire, had military guards, and the inmates were subjected to a very harsh regime.

For example, at Calfa we had to live in reed-covered huts through which we could see the sky, sleeping on layers of rat-infested straw. The lack of running water and of the most elementary sanitary conditions led to massive lice infection. We were "bathing" in a swamp about four kilometres away from the camp. At Alexandreni and Doaga, the huts were made of wood, with bunk-beds; there was almost no heating during the cold winters of 1942-43 and 1943-44, and the deficient sanitary conditions were still creating problems.

In all these camps, the food was scarce and served in totally inadequate conditions. At Calfa, for example, we had to eat on the bare ground near a rail track.

There was also constant beating: One commandant of the military battalion ordered 25 blows daily to anyone found with lice, knowing very well that everybody was infested.

Terror and moral tension reigned in all military forced labor camps, and any absence or avoidance of performing forced labor resulted in deportation to Transnistria of the whole family of whoever was found guilty.

The question I would like to ask is: Were the conditions in the forced military labor battalions in Hungary and on the Ukrainian front worse than those in the Romanian forced military labor battalions?

In the light of the above, I call for including in the eligible category the survivors of the Romanian forced military labor battalions, especially since their number is in permanent decline due to old age and precarious health.

Says Goldhagen is right on guilt of Germans

I vehemently disapprove of the comments made against historian Daniel J. Goldhagen as reported in The CJN (July 9).

I have assiduously read Hitler's Willing Executioners: Ordinary Germans and The Holocaust. As a survivor of the Holocaust, I do agree with his publication. I wept on reading the descriptions, which I found powerful and most descriptive.

No country could have perpetrated measures such as mass slaughter and anti-Semitism without the bureaucrats who signed orders; privileged officials who confiscated people's property, took away their rights; soldiers, volunteers and collaborators who abused, consigned and guarded victims, first in transit concentration camps, and later among those selected for gas chambers.

Every day, in their homes and families, in places of work and worship and throughout Germany and occupied areas, the majority of the German people did not offer resistance. Their government propagated fear, hate and death and with unrelenting zeal, and its civilians and soldiers collectively and individually willingly executed orders, orchestrated violence and pain, and committed the most heinous crimes against humanity.

The brother's grave, at last, is marked

By JERZY JASTRZEBOWSKI

Ya'anecha Elokim beyom tzara…

Simon Yarmusch half-recites, half-sings the Psalm of David. When his voice falters, Pinchas Menachem Joskowicz, the chief rabbi of Poland, picks up the verse. Suddenly, the remote forest on the Polish-Slovak border fills with the sounds of Hebrew.

Yesaghe v'HaShem Elokei Ya'akov …

That forgotten area in the woods in the Carpathian Mountains has heard Hebrew before. In August 1942, more than 500 Jews intoned Shema Yisrael close to here. Hitler's police shot adults in the back, hurled Jewish infants into the pit, finished them off with spades.

Rabbi Joskowicz will say the Kaddish over the mass grave, too. But for now, Simon Yarmusch, Rabbi Joskowicz and New York Rabbi Michael Schudrich from the Ronald Lauder Foundation pray over the Yarmusch grave. It stands alone, mysteriously.

Yishlach ezrecha, miKodesh…

About a dozen Jews from Krakow have come for the memorial service on that hot, humid evening in early June. But they willingly cede the place of honor to the local farmer Jan Holuta and his family. Without Holuta's determination to save a nameless Holocaust grave from oblivion there would have been no service at all.

Umi-Tziyon Yisadeka…

Renee Yarmusch huddles under a tree. Simon's wife is an American, but her parents were born not far from these beautiful, cursed hills, long before the Holocaust happened. She understands. So do the Holutas, even though they are of a different faith. They weep. Suddenly, I too feel a tear running down my cheek.

How It All Came About

Years ago, my friend, the Polish-Ukrainian peasant farmer Jan "Vanio" Holuta in the village of Tylawa, took his grandsons and me to a mass grave of Jews murdered in August 1942 by Hitler's police in a mountain valley. About 500 Jews from the rural towns of Dukla and Rymanow lie buried there. They have a marked grave.

Then Holuta pulled us deeper into the forest: "I want you and my grandsons to know there is another Jewish grave here that only I know and remember. There were two young brothers from Dukla. A few years ago, I remembered their names. They hid in the mountains till the first snowfall, when gendarmes tracked them down. A peasant sled-driver had to take the two under a police escort and later recalled how the Jews pleaded for their lives. But try to plead with Hitler's police! They shot and buried them right here, and I am telling you their story so that people will remember that human beings are buried under that bush. Sooner or later, someone will come to claim the bodies."

I was struck by the determination of my friend, who was fighting to preserve a memory of people of a different faith, people he had never met. He had driven a wooden marker into that spot in the ground, and when foraging boars dug it out, he drove an iron peg into the same spot. For remembrance.

What I saw was an awesome historical metaphor. Hitler's henchmen wiped out the entire Jewish people in east-central Europe, which had been their home for centuries. And the Nazis were hell-bent on going further: They wanted all memory of the Jewish race deleted. Jewish graves were to be levelled, matsevas used to pave roads.

And here was my friend, a semi-literate Polish-Ukrainian peasant, challenging all that. He had been tending the barely visible Jewish grave, because "sooner or later someone will come to claim the bodies." By doing this he defied Hitler, Himmler, Eichmann.

I made a commitment about the nameless grave and soon began the years of legwork that ultimately led to the scene described above.

I met old villagers in the area, asking the same questions over and over again: How did it happen? Who were the victims? What do you remember? After two years of asking questions, I stitched together the bits and pieces of their collective memory into the story of the Yarmusch family. Their name was originally spelled Jarmusz.

I took the suffering of that family to Canada. In The CJN, on Feb. 5, I published an appeal: "Are there any Dukla Jews left in the world – in Israel, America, Canada – to provide a minyan, so that two kids who did nothing wrong, except that they were born in the wrong place at the wrong time, would get a decent funeral at last? If there is anyone out there, please come forward. Please."

Explosion of Interest

Reaction from readers was phenomenal. The phone started ringing early on the morning after my plea was published. Murray Rose of Toronto was offering words of encouragement. Frederick Rose got me in touch with Gesher Galizien in the United States. Then Leah Judah of Toronto called to say that her late father, Rabbi Pinchas Hirschprung, had been the last pre-war rabbi of Dukla before serving for 29 years as chief rabbi of Montreal. Rabbi Hirschprung had died only two weeks before my appeal was published. Leah called her mother, Chaya Hirschprung, still in mourning after the death of her husband. When Chaya called back, saying that she knew of a family named Yarmusch in New York, I knew I was on to something big.

A few days later, my phone rang again. From Florida. But in Polish, an old voice sobbed into my ear: "Mr. Jastrzebowski, hear me – I am Simon Yarmusch. Lord, oh Lord, how did you find their grave? They were my dear brothers, Shlomo and Luzer, Shlomo and Luzer!"

Simon's Story

He was the youngest of four brothers. The oldest two – Shlomo and Luzer – were forced by Germans to work in a quarry near Dukla, but they escaped back to town. Simon didn't know what happened to them later. He also worked as slave labor in a quarry nearby.

Later Germans transferred Simon to Plaszow (remember Schindler's List), then to a munitions factory in Czestochowa, and later to Nordhausen-Dora where he hewed tunnels in solid rock. Finally, he was transported to Buchenwald.

When the war front drew close, SS guards took the Buchenwald inmates on a death march. Few survived. Then, on a Friday (the religious Jew still remembers it was a Friday), American troops suddenly swarmed over the dying skeletons. Simon remembers he was so weak he couldn't even get up from the ground to greet the liberators.

He spent six months in a Swedish hospital. Ultimately, in 1947, he came to America. After years of rabbinical studies and hard work, he opened a hardware store in Manhattan. The company is now run by his sons, Murray and Allan, and his daughter Suzie helps out.

Not in his wildest dreams did Simon imagine he would some day find the grave of his brothers. After the service in the forest, he consulted the rabbis. The Polish governor of the province and the mayor of Dukla had promised every assistance to have the remains exhumed and reburied at the town's Jewish cemetery.

But the rabbis decided that the peace of the remains should not be disturbed. The presence of the Holuta family nearby guarantees that the grave will be protected against desecration. Shlomo and Luzer will sleep in peace, awaiting the arrival of the Messiah.

Opinions

The enigmatic side of Israeli life

By Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

Every country has its enigmas, things particular to its culture, history and mentality which often don't add up, especially for non-natives. Israel is no exception. When it comes to peculiarities endemic to life in the Jewish state, there are many that defy my understanding, even after living here almost eight years.

Last winter, when I sat down to write about such things for this column, the list kept growing. I quickly ran out of space and promised a second instalment.

Here it goes:

Around Again: While most of the Western world recycles an increasing amount of its garbage, Israel recycles less than five percent. This despite the acute lack of land (for dumping) and the damage to valuable aquifer water resources by current dumping.

Saturday Night Fever: With the end of Shabbat, Israelis pack the country's shopping centres. You can't move for the crowds and can't hear for the deafening noise, but still the hoards keep coming back every week.

Lots Of Talk: As part of the battle against horrendously high road accident rates, the Knesset passed legislation banning the widespread use of hand-held cell phones by drivers. It is virtually never enforced by police.

Real Money: Although all salaries in Israel are in shekels, all prices for homes for sale or for rent are in U.S. dollars.

The Plight Of The Non-Orthodox: If ever there was a place where an alternative to Orthodox Judaism would seem attractive, it's Israel. Judging by the failure of the Reform and Conservative movements to reach the wider Israeli public, however, it's not.

Big Talkers: Like a broken record, Netanyahu's coalition partners repeatedly threaten to leave his fragile government. They never do, even when the cabinet doesn't yield to their pressure. Yet every time they vow to bolt, there's great sound and fury in the media, although none of the coalition parties has an interest in toppling the government.

Out On a Date: For some events, the date is determined by the Hebrew calendar. For other things, the secular calendar is used.

Delivery Man Blues: In many cities, street signs seem a luxury item. Making matters worse when you are looking for a particular address, some buildings don't have signs with street numbers, and for those that do, the numbers often are not visible from the road.

I'm OK, You're OK, Everything's OK: The infamous Yehiye beseder (It will be all right) expression and attitude still prevail, despite having proven tragically infallible many times in the past.

Consuming Disinterest: Israelis can be a stubborn, argumentative bunch. Strangely, when it comes to standing up for their rights as consumers, they're surprisingly docile. The only ones who ever organize boycotts are the ultra-Orthodox on religious grounds.

Belaboring The Point: In June, millions of dollars were spent electing the leadership of the Histadrut, Israel's main labor federation. Few people cared and even fewer understand the relevance of this bureaucratic behemoth. For all its pro-worker rhetoric, its priority seems to be to protect the interests of its own public sector elite.

Communication For The Nation: In much of the world, Jews are leaders in the public relations industry. Yet for years, Israel has been doing a terrible job of PR for its battered international image.

Sardine Appeal: Every summer, you'll find the Kinneret region run amok with vacationers packed like lemmings in Tiberias and neighboring beaches. Yet less than a half-hour away, the Golan Heights, one of the greenest, most open, tranquil parts of the country remains largely devoid of visitors.

Punishment For Leaving The Classroom: Public schools, at least those in Jerusalem, don't feel the need to supply their washrooms with toilet paper – and parents don't seem to mind.

Capital Gains? In 1991, Jerusalem built a new soccer stadium seating12,000 people, with parking facilities for less than 300 cars. As National League games are on Saturdays when there is no public transportation, the number of fans arriving by car is even greater. The result: the adjacent neighborhood of Malha is virtually barricaded in by thousands of illegally-parked cars that police never ticket. Adding to the misery, this year the municipality spent $10 million (US) to expand the stadium without expanding the already inadequate parking facilities.

Straight Ahead: The propensity of Israelis to give directions even when they don't know what they're talking about.

The biggest enigma? The longer I live here the more things I discover that I don't understand. That means there is sure to be a lot more material for another such column in the future.

The UN: Still a source of hatred

By Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

On the face of it, a new international court to try war criminals would seem to be a good cause. However, even before it could start operations, this institution was hijacked by the same anti-Israeli agenda that has poisoned other international institutions, including the United Nations.

In a deliberate move to create yet another base for attacking Israel, the UN-sponsored conference bowed to Egyptian and Syrian pressure to include "settlements in occupied territories" in the list of war crimes. Of course, the definition of "settlements" and "occupied territories" will not be based on careful consideration of the facts, but will be a political and ideological decision determined by the usual anti-Israeli majority.

The international "community" in general, and the UN in particular, are still far too biased to provide moral guidance and dispense justice for the world. The vast majority of the states are undemocratic, and many of the democratic ones are often willing to sacrifice principle for expediency. When it comes to Israel and the Middle East, the gap between the ideal and political reality is still huge.

Recent events in the UN highlight how little has changed since the dark days when a majority of states declared Zionism to be racism. In the past few weeks, the president of the UN Security Council issued a formal statement criticizing Israel's plan to expand the municipal boundaries of Jerusalem (mainly to the west, in areas which have been part of Israel since 1948). This plan was primarily designed to improve sewage services and traffic flow in the Jerusalem area. The reason for the UN's interference was clear – the continuing Palestinian and Arab propaganda campaign designed to isolate and weaken Israel politically. The Arab charge that this issue was related to the permanent status negotiations was unfounded, but this did not prevent the UN from endorsing the Arabs' position.

In contrast, a few weeks earlier, the UN accepted an initiative that clearly violated the agreement to leave permanent status issues to be negotiated between the parties. In an effort to upgrade their status and move towards independence, the Palestinians sought to gain most of the attributes of a member state. After some softening of support from Europe, the proposal was watered down, but in the end, the UN General Assembly voted (124-4) to give the Palestinians the right to participate in general debates and to co-sponsor draft resolutions. The message was that if the Palestinians unilaterally declare an independent state in May 1999, in violation of the Oslo accords, they will be recognized by the majority of UN members. However, their continuing support for terrorism or questions regarding their ability to manage a state are not on the agenda.

While upgrading the Palestinians, the UN still discriminates against Israel. The UN is organized in terms of regional groupings that are the basis for election to the Security Council, the UN Commission on Human Rights and other UN bodies. Every UN member is also a member of such a regional group, except for Israel. The Arab states have refused to agree to include Israel in the Middle East group, and the Israeli application to join the Western European and North American group has also been rejected, leaving Israel as a second class state in the UN framework. Despite the pledge of Secretary General Kofi Annan to rectify this problem, (announced during his recent visit to Israel), nothing has changed.

The use of the UN to promote anti-Israeli hatred also continues. Recently, the Palestinian observer to the Commission on Human Rights charged that Israelis had infected 300 Palestinian children with the AIDS virus. The chair of the Commission admitted that this charge was "an allegation made without evidence, on the basis of a newspaper article ...proved completely false." However, under Arab pressure, the chair backed down from earlier plans to make the statement publicly.

During an earlier session, the Syrian ambassador repeated the Damascus blood libel claiming that Jews killed Christian children to use their blood to make matzah. The Western democracies (with the exception of the United States) lacked the moral fortitude to challenge this age-old anti-Semitic libel. As a result of such bias, the UN has lost credibility.

It is no surprise that the Oslo agreements were negotiated outside of the UN framework. Indeed, since 1993, hundreds of Israelis have been killed and thousands injured by Palestinian terror attacks. During the same period, 34 resolutions deploring Israel were passed at the UN, but not one resolution focused on Palestinian terrorism.

Canada has a central role in the UN, but its representatives, like those of the European democracies, have failed to end the abuse of this forum to attack Israel. It is time for the Canadian government to use its influence to end this campaign of hatred against Israel and the Jewish people.

The new revisionism

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Historical Revisionism is not a new phenomenon. The expert practitioners of this craft were the Soviets who constructed and reconstructed history according to the latest whims of the Kremlin.

In the Jewish world the term Revisionism has had a positive connotation, for it was meant primarily to rewrite the future of the Jewish people rather than revise its past. Revisionists constituted a Zionist party that arose in the 1920s and achieved its first prominence through Vladimir Jabotinsky's opposition to the leadership of Chaim Weizmann. Jabotinsky, basing himself on Herzl's concept of Zionism as essentially a political movement, defined Revisionism as follows: "Ninety percent of Zionism may consist of tangible settlement work, and only 10 percent of politics; but those 10 percent are the precondition of success." After the founding of Israel in 1948, Revisionism was represented by the Herut party, led by Menachim Begin, and gained power some 30 years later. Today's Likud, headed by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, is an amalgam in which Revisionism plays the major role, and which constitutes the centre of Israel's nationalist ideology.

Utterly different is the so-called Historical Revisionism which has become the tool of anti-Semites. It attempts to rewrite the Holocaust and deny its existence. Ernst Zundel is a practitioner of this latest attempt to revisit the past.

Now yet another revisionism has arisen: Arab claims that Jews never had any relation to the land of Israel, neither to Jerusalem nor to anything remotely connected to it. Which is to say that Bible and Jewish tradition as well as documented history are of no account in this form of revising history. Its purpose is obvious: It is to show that only Arabs (or more precisely, Muslims) have a claim to Jerusalem and all of Eretz Yisrael.

But it may very well be that it is not Jewish but Arab claims to Jerusalem that need revision. Their religious relationship to Jerusalem is not in doubt, but their political one is. The former Israeli ambassador to Egypt, Moshe Sasson, an expert on Islamic affairs, explained the exact nature of Islam's connection to Jerusalem: "We must differentiate between the holiness of the city and the holiness of sites within the city. The Caliph Abd El-Malik, when he moved his centre of power from Damascus to Jerusalem, sought to build the mosques there. The Al Aqsa mosque was built 61 years after Mohammed's death. Jerusalem is not mentioned even once in the Koran (It is mentioned 667 times in the Bible), and the Al Aqsa mosque is mentioned only once – and even that is not a reference to the mosque of today. In verse 1 chapter 17, the Koran states that Allah transported Mohammed from Mecca to Al-Aqsa; but this cannot be referring to the mosque in Jerusalem, because when Mohammed was alive, there were no mosques in the city. Rather, it refers to the end (aktsa, in Arabic) of the sky. Sasson said that in Islam, there is a differentiation between political capitals." Sasson said that the holiness of Jerusalem to Islam should therefore not be an issue when discussing the city's future political status. But of course, it will be.

Rabbinic Reflections

Mitzvot are addictive

By RABBI MORDECAI ZEITZ

As you read this, I will be returning from Israel after our ninth annual synagogue pilgrimage. Two busloads of parents and children, bubbies and zaydes will have crisscrossed Israel for two weeks.

For most participants it will be mind boggling: visiting the sites, absorbing the information and experiencing the beauty of the country and the vibrancy of the life and the people we encounter. The group will forge lasting memories of a living Jewish experience. Canadian Jewry can feel proud that a majority of its adult population has visited Israel at least one time.

Standing before the Kotel during the week leading up to Tisha b'Av is an amazing phenomenon. On the one hand, we mourn the destruction of Temple in Jerusalem, while on the other hand, we stand with great pride beneath the flag of the State of Israel and the watchful eyes of the soldiers of the IDF. Our past of wailing at the Wall and our present of rejoicing at the Wall sort of tell it all. History has dealt us some very difficult hands, but the chemistry between the Jewish people and the land of Israel, especially the city of Jerusalem and the Temple Mount, is intrinsic and everlasting.

What we do with this great gift can determine the future of Jewish destiny. Whether Tisha b'Av will be feast or fast is totally dependent upon us. The enormity of the responsibility becomes crystal clear when we play back the memories of the Kotel on the eve of Tisha b'Av.

On leaving Israel, I always endeavor to challenge my groups to take something away from Israel. This year, I told them that if you really want to have a lasting experience and really engage in a continuing Israel experience, then – don't laugh – grab a few bagels.

The famed Chafets Chaim told of his experience with bagels. In his town there was an old woman who made her living selling bagels on the street corner. One day, she was jostled by some youngsters on the street and all her bagels fell to the ground.The children pounced upon the scattered bagels, grabbing as many as they could carry and then running away. The old woman, sat down on the pavement, and began to cry and bemoan her plight. "Foolish woman," called out a passer-by. "If you sit and cry, you end up with nothing. Chup some bagels too."

A bagel is a small thing with few calories, but it is the way each of us can start upon the road of heightened sensitivity in the performance of mitzvot and maintaining positive Jewish identity. Our Jewish diet does not have to be loaded down with heavy stuff. Simply grabbing a bagel – the Jewish lifesaver – can help keep us afloat and bring us to the next level of Jewish identity. While it's nice to think in terms of having the whole cartfull, you can start with at least one bagel. If not, you are left with the empty hole with nothing to hold on to.

Summer gives us some extra time, and rather than freeing ourselves from obligations and responsibilities, gives us the opportunity to perform an extra mitzvah or two, to make serious plans for the involvement of our children in meaningful Jewish education and for our own involvement in that process by learning alongside of them. It is the opportunity to find the time for some serious study, for planting the seeds for future activities around the holidays that are coming up. Perhaps this is the year for the Sukkah or the Etrog and the Lulav.

If you chup just one bagel, there is an amazing assortment of flavors and toppings that go with it. One bagel is just the beginning because the taste is so fantastic that it whets our appetite and there is no stopping us. Bagels, or mitzvot, are addictive, but they result in a more meaningful and purposeful life, not only for oneself, but for the entire family, with a ripple effect for the community.

Work to rules

By RABBI JAY KELMAN

While increased religious devotion and practice is a primary goal of Judaism, its implementation may not be carried out at the expense of others. A prime example of this can be seen in the laws governing workers. While Jewish law posits that one must rise in the presence of a scholar, one may not do so during working hours. Hence, agricultural workers are not allowed to greet passing rabbinical scholars. Similarly, while basic gratitude demands that we bench after every meal we eat, the Talmud modified this requirement, ordering workers to substitute a shortened version.

It is not only while on the job that an employee must devote his energies to work. Unless sanctioned by the employer, one may not engage in any activity outside working hours that would have a detrimental effect on productivity.

In our complex living and working environments, what constitutes forbidden activities is not readily defined, but they would include teachers – considered by Jewish law to be the most important of all professionals – habitually depriving themselves of sleep or a worker fasting an optional fast such as a yahrzeit.

It is a generally accepted principle of Jewish law that in commercial matters the accepted practices take precedence over strict Jewish law. So while technically a worker would not be allowed to make personal phone calls from work or take a coffee break, these practices have become commonly accepted by employers. While calling home at lulls in work may therefore in practice be allowed, receiving calls of a personal nature presents an additional moral dilemma. This is due to the fact that interruptions often have the effect of throwing one's concentration off balance. It can often take 10 minutes to recover from a two-minute interruption.

This is equally true of work related interruptions, but those form part of the employer's expectations, something which can not be said of personal interruptions. While receiving personal phone calls has become accepted practice in the workplace it would be meritorious to receive such calls only when you can get back to work just where you left off.

Due to the imperative of being free, Jewish law rules that a worker can not be forced to work against his will. To do so would be akin to slavery. It is for this reason that some authorities forbid signing a contract of greater than three years duration. In practice, most authorities allow longtime contracts, as contracts today generally do not call for the employee to live in the employer's home. But, when a longtime contract is signed in order to benefit an employee and not the employer, the issue of servitude no longer applies.

It is due to the above mentioned fear of slavery that a worker in theory, has the right to quit his job at any time. In practice, this freedom is restricted depending on the nature of the work and the original terms of employment.

A worker who signs a contract is morally bound to fulfil the terms of the contract. While no monetary penalties are assessed unless the employer suffers a monetary loss, such as when replacement workers are hard to find or can only be found at higher wages, leaving before a contract expires is morally reprehensible. Additionally, there is the crucial element of chilul HaShem, the desecration of God's name, which invariably results when a Jew, especially an observant Jew, does not keep his commitments.

Employees (and employers) must not only consider their personal situation when deciding on employment options but must be careful not to impinge on the rights of others.

Books

By Bernard Baskin

Summertime readings

Summer is upon us and there is the opportunity for sustained reading, essential to the evolution of one's personality, options and values. Books not only convey knowledge, they also offer solace, escape and inspiration.

The following list of titles is divided into three categories: classic books that every Jew should read; a number of relatively recent books of interest and a group of splendid anthologies. All books should be available in paper-bound form.

Night by Elie Wiesel. Childhood experiences in Auschwitz. A brief but stark and searing memoir that raises profound theological issues.

As a Driven Leaf by Milton Steinberg. Set in the Talmudic period, this thoughtful and disturbing book about the heretic Rabbi Elishi ben Abuyah and his obsessive search for faith, remains pertinent and provocative.

Herzog by Saul Bellow. One of the enduring American Jewish novels. It is a manual of the intellectual debates of our time, as well as the story of a troubled man and personal crisis.

The Assistant by Bernard Malamud. How a beleaguered young non-Jew learns the meaning of suffering in a small, intimate Jewish world – and his startling decision.

Collected Stories by I.B. Singer. Selected from his 12 books, these astonishing pieces bear out the author's declaration in his introduction: "Genuine literature has the magical power of merging causality with purpose, doubt with faith, the passions of the flesh with the feelings of the soul."

The Yeshiva by Chaim Grade. A long read about Lithuanian life in the period between the world wars by a master Yiddish writer. This ambitious and absorbing book is peopled with a host of unforgettable characters.

The Last Of The Just by Andre Schwarz-Bart. An original and many-sided epic about the last of the 36 righteous men in every generation upon whose virtue the existence of the world depends.

Fugitive Pieces by Anne Michaels. Highly praised, this poetic narrative of the Holocaust period and beyond is perhaps the most successful novel, ever commercially written by a Canadian Jew. It is a must read.

The Family Markowitz by Allegra Goodman. A witty, insightful narrative of three generations of a contemporary American Jewish family with roots in Israel and England.

The Putter Messer Papers by Cynthia Ozick. Stories about a strange, powerful woman and her unlikely experiences, by a great literary stylist.

If This Is a Man and The Truce by Primo Levi. Two memorable novellas of a young Italian chemist who is shipped to Auschwitz. The first is an account of his existence there until the liberation. The second relates how he managed to make his way home in the chaos of post-war Europe.

Badenheim 1939 by Aharon Applefeld. A tragic but restrained account of secular Jews who think of themselves first as Austrians when they are confronted by a harsh and unbelievable reality. Applefeld is a splendid Israeli writer.

Mr. Mani by A.B. Yehoshua. Translated from the Hebrew, this exciting and innovative novel of a Sephardi family covers five generations. The settings are multicultural and exotic.

More European Cyber Travel

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Today we conclude our cyber-tour of the Jewish sights and sites of Europe.

The oldest Jewish monument in western Europe is also one of its newest. The Jewish Monument of Rouen is actually located under that French city's law courts [http://www.cpi.fr/mj/mon_juif.htm]. Discovered just 20 years ago, it dates back to the year 1100. There is no doubting its Jewish origins, but there is a disagreement whether the building was originally a synagogue, a Jewish high school or the home of a rich Jewish person.

While in France, you can also take in the Memorial to the Unknown Jewish Martyr in Paris. The memorial commemorates European Jews who died in the Holocaust. The crypt contains ashes from concentration camps and the Warsaw Ghetto. I recommend a visit to this French-only Web site [http://www.calvacom.fr/calvaweb/memorial/versuch/index.htm] and the much smaller English-language site [http://www.paris.org/Musees/Juif.Inconnu/].

It's off to Brussels now and the Belgium Jewish Museum [http://www.mjb-jmb.org/]. In addition to a large collection of Judaica dating back to the 16th century, the museum also houses a large genealogical facility with a registry of the Jews of Brussels dating back to the census of 1756 [http://www.mjb-jmb.org/mjb-jmb/eng/gene.htm]. That page also contains several contacts if you're of Belgian ancestry and looking for genealogical help.

When I visited the Anne Frank House Web site a couple of years ago, it only had the most basic of information. Things have changed [http://www.annefrank.nl/]. The site now has extensive photos of the house plus a detailed history of the individuals who were hidden there and the people who risked their lives to help them hide.

Also in Holland, you'll find Amsterdam's Jewish Historical Museum [http://www.hi.nl/musea/joodsmus.htm]. Four former synagogues dating from the 17th and 18th century have been converted into a stunning museum that chronicles the history of that country's Jewish community. Even if you don't speak the language, take a look at the museum's Dutch-only interactive Web site [http://www.jhm.nl/] and their impressive use of video.

You can find links to more Jewish museums at Maven [http://www.maven.co.il/subjects/idx170.htm], Hareshima [http://www.hareshima.com/culture/museums.htm] and the Jewish Communications Network [http://www.jcn18.com/jhot1.htm#h].

I want to conclude our European trek in Dublin. The Irish Jewish Museum has a very simple Web site [http://www.bess.tcd.ie/roots/PROTOTYP/musjewsh.htm]. You get the facts about the museum but little more. That's why I prefer the Web site created by Zachary Blocker. Blocker is a student at Tufts University in Medford, Mass. After visiting Dublin, he put together a Web site with his Impressions of the Irish Jewish Museum [http://www.cs.tufts.edu/~zblocker/ijm/].

An example from Blocker's site: "The curators (whose Dublin accents mix interestingly with Jewish intonations) act more like storytellers than gallery supervisors. When I was there, one of them went out of his way to give me a proper introduction to the story of the Irish Jews, reading aloud in Gaelic the passage from the Annals of Innisfallen which record the first arrival of Jews in Ireland (it's common for Irish Jews to be trilingual: English, Gaelic, Hebrew!)"

This is a lovely, unofficial Web site. But even if you're not up to creating your site but have a story to tell about your Jewish journey, there's still a place to swap your stories and memories [http://jewishfamily.com/scripts/newjfl/forum/forum.asp?ForumID=132&TopicID=15].

Happy travels – real and virtual.

Have identity, will travel

By PETER NEWMAN

Guest Voices

When you're a Canadian, it can be hard to keep track of who you are. I have been all over this country, and I've learned that your identity is never on solid ground.

I'm from Ontario. When I went to live "out west," in British Columbia, they called me an Easterner.

Naturally, I figured that when I went "back east" to Atlantic Canada, I would fit right in. Not quite. In Nova Scotia they called me an Upper Canadian.

When I travelled further east, I received a new label. In Newfoundland they called me a Mainlander.

On my visits to the North, I somehow thought I would avoid being labelled. But the sense of regional identity there was just as strong. In the Arctic I was startled to be called a Southerner.

So I headed south, to Quebec. In Quebec I spoke French, but was called an Anglais.

I find being an Anglais an especially odd label. The English appear to think so, too. When I tried a visit to my new homeland, England, I was called an American.

And anywhere I go in Canada, I'm rather an oddity – a Jew.

Interestingly, my identity as a Jew is secure only in Canada. When I visit Israel, I turn into an Anglo-Saxon!

Diplomatically Speaking

Jewish life is everywhere

By JEHUDI KINAR

At the end of August it will be three years since my family and I arrived in Toronto. Our previous posting before Canada was in San Francisco, where my assigned territory consisted of the northern half of California as well as Idaho, Montana, Oregon, Washington and Alaska.

The move from the United States to Canada was dramatic, but as an Israeli interested in North America, this has been an ideal way to explore a wide spectrum of ideas and lifestyles.

The area around San Francisco, the Greater Bay area, has a Jewish population of about one-quarter of a million, which means that it is larger than the Jewish community in the Greater Toronto Area. There is only one Jewish high school which is Orthodox, although about ninety percent of the students or their parents are from the former Soviet Union and are not observant. It is combined with a primary school, and there are six more Jewish primary schools in the area with certainly less than 1,500 students.

Because of the high rate of assimilation in this part of California (probably the highest in the United States with an intermarriage rate of more than seventy percent) there is not much interest in Jewish schools. In contrast, Seattle, with a high concentration of Sephardi Jews originally from Greece, boasts a wonderful Jewish education system.

It often seems to me that the further west one travels in North America, the more assimilated are the Jewish communities. In San Francisco I learned that many Jews migrated there from the east coast in an effort to escape the very close family environment. People wanted to become more liberal and that had an impact on synagogue life.

Many of the German Jews arriving in the United States moved on to California, and San Francisco became a stronghold for Reform Jews. As a matter of fact, the Conservative and especially the Orthodox community is very small there. Support for Israel was minimal until the end of the 1950s and grew tremendously after the Six Day War. Like Toronto Jews, it has taken Jews in San Francisco at least a generation or two to feel accepted by the surrounding culture.

It is always an interesting and moving experience to visit some of the smaller North American communities. Over the past two months I visited Lethbridge, Alta. and Thunder Bay, Ont. Both towns have a small Jewish community and beautiful old synagogues, which not that long ago used to be quite active. Nowadays, they struggle for a minyan. I had seen the same symptoms of a diminishing Jewish community in Idaho and Montana.

On a more positive note, in Alaska, with a Jewish community of about 3,000 (more than half living in Anchorage) I found a much more vibrant community. In Anchorage itself, where I happened to spend a Shabbat, quite a number of the visitors to the Chabad minyan were also going to the other synagogues in town (Reform). The work done by the rabbis of both synagogues was impressive.

Even further north, in Fairbanks, I visited what must be one of the most northern synagogues in the world, appropriately named "Or Hazafon" (Northern Light). Now that we are approaching Tisha b'Av, I pity those who must wait the extra hours till sundown to break their fast there! Even the capital of Alaska, Juneau, has an active Jewish community. Clearly, the size of the Jewish population is not a predictor of the strength of Jewish community spirit, which sometimes flourishes in the most surprising locations.

Strong government support for Ne'eman Commission recommendations

Bobby Brown

A key advisor to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu is optimistic about the success of recommendations made by the Ne'eman Commission on the controversial issue of religious conversion.

"There is 5% of the Jewish world on one side which wants an explosion and 5% on the other side. The vast majority of Jews want greater understanding," said Netanyahu's advisor on Diaspora affairs, Bobby Brown during a recent interview with UJA Federation communications director Howard English.

Brown, who reiterated the Israeli government's strong backing for the commission, was particularly buoyant about the new Institute for Jewish Studies to prepare people for conversions. Based on the Ne'eman Commission's suggestion, the institute instructors would come from all religious streams, but the conversions themselves would be conducted by the Chief Rabbinate.

Q. The conversion institute itself has become the subject of controversy among many involved in the debate. How do you rate its chance for success?

A. The chances for the institute to succeed are good. There are nine people sitting around the table. They're all very serious and very reasonable. These are people who want this to succeed.

Q. How will the institute alleviate concerns about instructors coming from different religious streams?

A. Recently representatives of each stream submitted a sample curriculum. And the conversion curricula were almost identical. We want to take potential instructors and put them through a preparatory course, so there won't be any infighting. Once a potential convert completes the course, the test cases (for conversion completion) will be in Beersheva, Haifa and an unspecified location in the centre of the country.

"... we have to find the maximum amount of flexibility and sensitivity."

Q. The Chief Rabbinate has yet to fully endorse the institute. How will the government be dealing with that?

A. The chief rabbis will still be the ones who appoint judges to the rabbinical court (overseeing conversions). If after two years, we don't have a flexible court, we've created a political case. The Rabbinate is an arm of the State of Israel. Their budget is assigned by the Knesset. There is a strong argument that the Knesset would take a look at their budget very carefully. Ya'acov Ne'eman himself has stated that if the Rabbinate won't convert, there will be a panel of three judges who will. If you create a vacuum, that vacuum will be filled.

Q. How much flexibility are we talking about?

A. Within halacha (religious law), we have to find the maximum amount of flexibility and sensitivity. We've created a consensus on the minimum standard...If we allow everything to be separate (Orthodox, Conservative and Reform) - if my son can't marry your daughter - we've created three religions. On the other hand, we don't want just one stream.

"The first step is Jews talking to Jews."

Q. How much influence did the Diaspora have on the conversion issue?

A The Diaspora and the UJA Federation movement had a great deal to do with the formation of the Ne'eman Commission...There are massive changes in the relationship of Jews in Israel to Jews in the Diaspora. In 1948, the average Jew in Israel came from the same cities and even between religious and non-religious, the gap wasn't that wide. Today the one thing that binds kids in Israel and the Diaspora is popular music. In North America, Judaism requires a religious and communal commitment. In Israel, you're automatically Jewish because the holidays are Jewish holidays. It creates a Jewish consciousness.

Q. Another hot spot is the kotel (Western Wall) where disputes have occurred when Conservative and Reform men and women conduct their own services there. What are your thoughts on resolving that problem?

A. The kotel is a very large wall. You could divide it into many sections. One of the places we're looking at is Robinson's Arch – along the path leading up to the Temple Mount – as a possible location for alternate prayers. As far as I'm concerned, the more sections of the kotel we use for prayer, the more it enhances the Jewish hold on the kotel area.

Q. Do you have any prescription to resolve the problems surrounding us as Jews?

A. I still believe that Israel's Supreme Court or even the Knesset is not the place to resolve these issues. The first step is Jews talking to Jews.

UJA Federation is reaching for Fifty

Leaders of UJA Federation's upcoming Campaign for Fifty are urging members of the community to make the unprecedented $50 million fundraising drive a priority in their charitable giving.

Canvasser training Chair Jonathan Miller previewed new strategies.

"Our goal is for every Jewish family in Toronto to view their UJA Federation gift as their preeminent gift," Campaign Co-Chair Brent Belzberg told more than 70 of the organization's leading fundraisers last week. "We must make sure our supporters understand that no other Jewish gift touches more lives," said Belzberg who, with Lawrence Tanenbaum, is heading the effort to raise $50 million annually by 2001. The $50 million objective is $13.5 more than the amount raised last year.

The group, which gathered at the home of Julia and Henry Koschitzky for a pre-campaign leadership retreat, was briefed on how the additional $13.5 million will be used to meet the growing needs of Toronto's Jewish community. Based on extensive consultations, UJA Federation will be allocating new funds raised to strengthen Jewish identity, assist the vulnerable, including more than 4,000 local children living in poverty, and rescue Jews, primarily from the former Soviet Union. Participants also heard from Morris Zbar, UJA Federation's Vice-President of Community Planning and Development, Shirley Worth, Chair of UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education and March of the living alumnus Shalomi Abraham who recounted his emotional journey to Poland and Israel. "I came back a changed person," said Abraham, who expressed his desire to become a community volunteer. "We are well on our way to setting a new standard for this community,"said Belzberg.

Shalomi Abraham said the March of the Living, which is supported by UJA Federation, changed his life.

It was a great night for newcomers

Cool showers didn't dampen the warm welcome more than100 newcomers to the community received recently from UJA Federation's Shalom Toronto volunteers.

Participants at the Shalom Toronto reception were welcomed to the city for the first time and were presented with a Shalom Toronto complimentary gift basket filled with food and community information to make them feel right at home.

Every year, Shalom Toronto volunteers greet hundreds of new arrivals, from Montreal, other North American cities, Israel and the former Soviet Union, offering a friendly face and practical help with everything from identifying Jewish day schools to opportunities for community involvement.

Twenty-five year old Neil Schneider says two years after moving from Montreal he still feels new to the city, but realizes, with Shalom Toronto's help, that he's not alone. "It's nice to meet other people in the same boat,"says Schneider, who is now actively involved in UJA Federation's Young Business Network.

Israeli-born Batya Piness, was one of many Shalom Toronto guests who found out about the program while visiting UJA Federation's Jewish Toronto web site www.feduja.org. "It can be very overwhelming arriving alone in a big city," Piness explains. "It's nice to know the community cares."

"Our goals are to show newcomers that they have somewhere to turn for help and to offer them ways to feel connected to their new community," says Miri Schneiderman, who co-chairs Shalom Toronto with Marlene Rochwerg.

Educator co-founded school

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Samuel Gwosdy, co-founder and longtime principal of North York Community Hebrew School, died recently of heart failure. He was 58.

Obituary

A teacher in the North York and Toronto public school systems, Gwosdy had a particular passion for the weekly Hebrew school, which he ran for the 25 years of its existence. He wrote all its courses – from beginner level through high school – and created a four-year training program for his teachers, many of whom were day school students.

The school began with 10 students in 1961, after Gwosdy finished a temporary Hebrew teaching stint and was asked by a few parents to teach their children privately. From its inception in Gwosdy's basement on Reiner Road, the Hebrew school grew to serve 850 students at its height.

Gwosdy was committed to Jewish education based on love and understanding, said his daughter Carol Bodenstein. His philosophy was one of inclusiveness, and students were taught about the approaches of all denominations of Judaism.

The curriculum included Yiddish, a two-year bar/bat mitzvah educational program and a structured day-by-day homework system to supplement the three classroom hours on Sunday mornings.

Gwosdy also introduced an accelerated program for older students with no Hebrew background, as well as a program in special education, his professional area of expertise. Outside of classroom hours, students could participate in drama, choir or Israeli dance.

Much to Gwosdy's chagrin, the school was never recognized by the Board of Jewish Education and its hours were deemed insufficient to prepare students for their bar or bat mitzvah at certain synagogues.

Steven Schonblum, a former bar mitzvah teacher at the school who is now ritual director at the Pride of Israel Synagogue, recalled Gwosdy in a eulogy as an innovator who did things his own way.
